PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 101st CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION

SENATE—Friday, August 4, 1989

(Legislative day of Tuesday, January 3, 1989)

The Senate met at 9:15 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by the President pro tempore [Mr. BYRD].

PRAYER

The Chaplain, the Reverend Richard C. Halverson, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let us pray:

He that dwelleth in the secret place of the most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust.—Psalm 91:1, 2.

Mighty Lord, may the cover of Thy blessing rest upon all in the Senate family and their loved ones during the August recess. Grant to those who travel, a safe journey—to families, time for resolving difficulties and renewal in love—to those who have work commitments, the grace to fulfill—to those staff who have labored tirelessly these past days and must continue such work, refreshing in their labors—to all, some time of rest and recreation—to those ill in hospital or home, encouragement and rapid, total recovery.

The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: The Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and given thee peace.—Numbers 6:24-26.

Amen.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Delaware is recognized.

Mr. ROTH. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. ROTH pertaining to the introduction of S. 1531 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

OIL POLLUTION LIABILITY AND COMPENSATION ACT

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 686, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 686) to consolidate and improve Federal laws providing compensation and establishing liability for oilspills.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might be able to proceed as if in morning business for no longer than 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO] will proceed out of order not to exceed 5 minutes.

Mr. D'AMATO. I thank the Chair.

HOSTAGE RELEASE

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, events that have taken place in the Middle East in this past week have been tumultuous. Charges and countercharges have been made whether or not it was appropriate for Israel to take the action that it did. I believe they were proper.

I hope that in the fullness of time, given the concentration of the world community at large, the diplomatic efforts that are now being undertaken will result in the release of all those being held captive in Lebanon.

Mr. President, I think we have to make it abundantly clear, both in our diplomatic relations and in the manner in which we, and others, conduct negotiations, that we seek the return of all of the captives, and that the United States does have the will and the resolve to do what is right during these difficult times. If, however, our diplomatic efforts are not successful, and we hope they are and we pray that they are, I know that all of us stand behind our President in his determination to bring about a resolution of this situation. If we do not obtain the release of all who are held unjustly, we must be prepared to pursue all the legal courses available to us and seek extradition of those who have planned or carried out terrorist attacks against our citizens. That, Mr. President, is a principle which we should not put aside.

I believe we should pursue our negotiations with steadfast purpose but certainly let those with whom we are working know that if we cannot resolve these matters, we will seek extradition. I am talking particularly about Sheik Abdul Karim Obeid, who is held in Israel at this time. If all those being held in Lebanon are not freed, we should bring him to justice to face those charges under the laws and statutes of this country relating to the murder of Colonel Higgins and to other terrorist activities with which he may have been connected. It is important that we not flinch from the principles of law, that we let terrorists know there is no secure haven from the long arm of American justice.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll, the absence of a quorum having been suggested.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OIL POLLUTION LIABILITY AND COMPENSATION ACT

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair wishes to advise Senators, if I may have order, that time is running under the agreement. Twenty minutes were allotted for debate. There has been no request that the time not run. Time is being charged against both sides equally.

Mr. STEVENS. Parliamentary inquiry. Did the Chair say the time is running on the time for debate on the bill?

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for making that observation. Accordingly, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the quorum calls, that time not run against the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered. The time consumed on quorum calls will not be charged.

The Chair would inquire as to what about the other time which has passed?

Mr. BAUCUS. Will the Chair repeat that request?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair calls attention to the fact that 20 minutes are allotted for debate on this bill. The bill was laid down at 20 minutes after 9 o'clock a.m. So the time is rapidly being consumed.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the original 20 minutes to be equally divided on each side on the bill be reinstated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Beginning now?

Mr. BAUCUS. Beginning this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the 20 minutes allotted for debate on the bill will begin running now.

AMENDMENT NO. 686 TO AMENDMENT NO. 666

(Purpose: Perfecting amendment to amendment No. 666)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] proposes an amendment numbered 686 to the amendment numbered 666.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Amendment No. 666, to make certain perfecting amendments to S. 686, is amended on page 41 by inserting after line 20 the following new paragraph:

"(3) for any claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund, the term "damages" shall include but not be limited to the loss of taxes, fees, royalties, rents, or other revenues incurred by a political subdivision of a state due to the injury, destruction, or loss of real property, personal property, or natural resources, or diminished economic activity due to the discharge. This definition shall be deemed to be effective as of January 1, 1989."

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I allocate myself as much time as I might use.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time on this amendment is 20 minutes equally divided.

Mr. STEVENS. I made a specific request last evening that there be time for this Senator on the general debate on the bill. I was unaware that there was any limitation on the bill itself. I inquired twice. But I shall use part of the time on one of my amendments to make a statement that I wish to make on the bill.

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. BAUCUS. I do not have a copy of this amendment. May we please have a copy?

Mr. STEVENS. I would say my good friend has a copy, given to your staff.

Mr. BAUCUS. Which amendment?

Mr. STEVENS. Dealing with damages and the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund.

Mr. President, this bill now takes the Alaskan pipeline fund and makes it the basis for the new national fund that is created by the bill. After conferences with the distinguished majority leader and in an agreement that we reached concerning the accountability of that transfer, we have supported the bill.

One of the things this bill does is it preserves the claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund and transfers them over to the new fund created by this bill.

This is a very limited amendment. It covers only those claims that might be presented against the national fund because of potential claims against the liability fund. There is obviously only one incident that could give rise to such claims, and that is the Exxon Valdez.

In the past year, the managers of the Alaska pipeline liability fund changed their regulations and provided that no longer would damages include the taxes, fees, royalties, rents, and other revenues of a political subdivision that have been lost as a result of a claim that would give rise against the fund. That change made in the regulations of the liability fund was not conveyed to Alaska, was not conveyed to the communities affected.

What this amendment does is it reinstates, effective January 1 of this year, the potential claim of these communities against the Alaska fund, and those claims would be transferred to the national fund. I might say that it is a very remote possibility that there will ever be claims of this kind because, as we know, Exxon has acknowledged liability for the Exxon Valdez disaster, and is in fact now already compensating some of the cities, to a certain extent, for their losses. But there is a question as to whether there is a court decision that somehow or other might hold Exxon not responsible for the losses which would give rise for some people to present claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund.

The communities involved asked that we take action to reverse the decision of the managers of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund.

The Commerce Committee bill that was reported on the floor contained this provision. In presenting the amendment now that is before the Senate, we have a compromise between the Commerce Committee and the Public Works Committee. This provision, which was in the Alaska portion of the Commerce Committee bill, has been omitted.

I ask the Senate to restore it. It is something that the mayors and the people in the local political subdivisions that have suffered loss—and I might tell the Senate that one has to go through one of these disasters to realize what kind of losses people have, but they have lost revenues. They have lost rent on slips in their marinas. They have lost taxes that would have been paid to them from the people who would have been living in their community and bought goods and paid sales taxes. Those people are now living on troop ships rented from the Federal Government by Exxon. They are not buying in the cities. There has been a decline, overall, in the revenues of communities.

Now, again, I say to the Senate, this really is not a general provision. This is a very subjective Alaska provision. It is a safeguard against the possibility that these communities might have to present a claim against the liability fund. I ask this provision be restored.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE].

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, let me see if I understand this correctly. The claim would only be against the TAP's fund, am I correct in that? In other words, it would not be against the general fund that is being setup here?

Mr. STEVENS. No. The general fund is in fact the TAP's fund. You all have collected no money. We collected $248 million, and this bill transfers that money to the national fund. In doing so, it carries with it the claims that could be presented against the Trans-Alaska Liability Fund. So this preserves this type of claim against that fund, the new national fund, to which the moneys are now in the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Fund will be transferred.

Mr. CHAFEE. What I am trying to understand is that this fund is going to presumably reach a billion dollars, $500 million, with $500 million capacity to borrow. The TAP's fund is going over to some amount. Whether it is $200 million plus I am not sure.

These claims would go against that fund that comes over, not against the newly established fund; am I correct?

Mr. STEVENS. I might state the limits of liability under this amendment are the amounts that are in the existing Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund. It is not written to be a claim against the new national fund.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is good enough.

Mr. STEVENS. The claims of the existing Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund are transferred to the new fund, but they are limited by the amounts that are in the existing Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Senator very much for that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana [Mr. BAUCUS] is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I think this amendment makes eminent sense that damages also include taxes, fees, royalties, and so forth.

We accept the amendment

Mr. CHAFEE. We likewise accept the amendment on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alaska.

The amendment (No. 686), to amendment No. 666, was agreed to.

AMENDMENT NO. 687

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I have another amendment that is reserved, and I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] proposes an amendment numbered 687.

On page 30, line 17, after the period, insert the following new sentence:

"Such agreements shall provide for political subdivisions of the State to receive payments for reasonable costs and may authorize advance payments from such account to facilitate such efforts."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. STEVENS. I yield myself such time as I may need.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is another concept that was in the Commerce Committee bill reported to the floor and in the revision of the Commerce Committee amendment that this Senator thought would be offered intact to this bill. This provision has been left out.

This bill now provides that the President will make agreements with Governors covering contingencies such as oil spills.

The Commerce Committee bill required that of the amounts that would be made available to the on-scene commander in the event of any oil spill there be amounts advanced to States and local political subdivisions to meet the costs that they have incurred in attempting to meet the problems of any oil spill disaster that might affect them. Mr. President, I emphasize "that might affect them."

When you have the oil going down a coastline that is hundreds of miles long, it is the tides and wind conditions which determine which beach gets hit, communities are going to go out and build barriers against that oil. Even though nature may not bring oil to their beach in the end, they must prepare for oil to hit their beach. Nobody knows which beach will be hit until it happens by the act of God.

One of the problems we have had right now is Exxon is saying: "Wait a minute. Oil never hit that beach. Why should we pay those people for trying to keep oil from hitting the beach?"

It is the kind of thing that says you have to be hit by a truck before you have any recovery, but if you see a truck coming and you incur some liability by getting out of the way, that you cannot recover for that.

This is a massive amount of oil that may impact any area that is affected by the tide, drift conditions, wind, and sea, literally. If there is anything that is the act of God, it is the selectivity of where does the oil hit.

These people, the mayors and councils of the small communities believe they are entitled to recover the costs that they incur to protect their beaches and resources.

The Commerce Committee bill said, yes, they can recover under conditions to be established by the onscene commander; what is more, that they could get advances to help prepare. This bill before us now does not.

What my amendment seeks to do is say that in the agreements that the bill now mandates the President, to make with these communities; those agreements shall provide that the political subdivisions of a State will receive payments for reasonable costs and that they may receive advance payments to facilitate such efforts.

I tell the Senate this is the absolute, in my opinion, essence of the problem that we have had in Alaska, how to help local people who deal with the problems that come from disaster finance their efforts to respond to a spill, and remember, Mr. President, the other amendment took into account the fact that their revenues go down and their costs go up a staggering amount. They should be included in these agreements; they should not be dependent upon the whim of a Governor who might say at the last minute, "I've got people I would like to send out on this. We are going to take control of that. Nobody asked you to take that action to protect your area."

They should be included from the beginning and the relationship should be determined by the agreement with the President and the Governor.

Again, this does not mandate the payments. It authorizes advanced payments to facilitate effective local response to a spill.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes; I am happy to yield.

Mr. BREAUX. I would like to ask the Senator some questions because I am confused about what we did in committee.

Were these amendments offered in committee and accepted and somehow got dropped in the print?

The reason I am asking the question is if the Senator would look at page 30 of the bill, we are talking about beginning around line 3 that the Governor of each State is authorized to obligate the fund for the payment of removal costs in an amount not to exceed $250,000. That is what the bill says on page 30.

The question I have is, Is this changing that cap of $250,000, or is it still within the cap? And No. 2, the question is, Are we talking about the trans-Alaska pipeline fund because the bill does away with the trans-Alaska pipeline fund? It creates the new fund.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the new fund; and it does not do the same thing as our bill. Our bill would have had payments from the fund, and the Senator will see that it is on page 30 of our bill. This new bill now mandates the President to make an agreement with the Governor and that agreement will determine who is entitled to advances and to repayments from this new fund.

Mr. BREAUX. If the Senator will yield further, the Senator's amendment does not seem to have a limit on how much will be reimbursable. The bill talks about a cap of $250,000 on page 30 and then the amendment seems to say that the local subdivision is authorized to receive payments for all reasonably incurred costs. It does not speak to any cap.

The question is, Are we still within the cap or not?

Mr. STEVENS. This has nothing to do with Alaska now in particular. This is a general requirement for the agreements between the President and the Governor.

If you look back at our bill, this is what it says:

When a State or political subdivision thereof has commenced containment or cleanup efforts it may submit a request to the secretary of the department to which the Coast Guard is operating for advance payments from such amounts to facilitate such efforts. Such advances in aggregate shall not exceed $50 million.

That concept is not carried over in the bill that is before us now, and I seek to ensure that the agreement between the State and the President will include the rights of the local political subdivisions and, further, that they may receive moneys from the fund.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who controls time in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am not sure who controls time in opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If no Senator opposes the amendment——

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I do have a question.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my staff tells me I failed to answer completely the question of the Senator from Louisiana.

The answer is, in terms of the limitation it may come from the original advance, but there may be additional moneys because the bill authorizes the President to receive requests for additional moneys in addition to the $250,000. The $250,000 is automatically available to the Governor once a spill occurs. This bill directs the President to make arrangements with interested States to allow the transfer of additional funds. This amendment includes communities in those agreements.

Does that answer the Senator's question?

Mr. BREAUX. I think it does. I am not sure. I think it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who controls the time in opposition?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may control time in opposition to this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator from Alaska?

The original version of this amendment, in the third line—I will read from the amendment:

Such agreements shall provide for political subdivisions of the State to receive payments for reasonable costs.

Should not the phrase be "receive payments for reasonable removal costs"?

Mr. STEVENS. The original version of the amendment, as I submitted it, was that:

Such agreements shall provide for political subdivisions of the State which have commenced containment or cleanup efforts to receive payment for costs reasonably incurred and allow them to receive upon request advance payments from such account to facilitate such efforts.

In the redraft of it that has been done by staff this morning, the reference that the Senator has indicated is no longer in it.

If the Senator wishes to put "reasonable cleanup costs" back in, I have no problem.

Mr. BAUCUS. I urge the Senator to put in not cleanup costs but removal costs, because removal costs are defined in the bill and cleanup costs are not. We are going to get into a big interpretive question.

Mr. STEVENS. I am willing to amend the amendment in any way to satisfy the Senator with regard to that limitation. Does he wish to insert "removal costs"?

Mr. BAUCUS. Right.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would like to modify my amendment to insert the word "removal" before the word "costs"—"reasonable removal costs."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the Senator being allowed to modify his amendment? The Chair hears none.

Would the Senator send his modification to the desk?

The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 30, line 17, after the period, insert the following new sentence: "Such agreements shall provide for political subdivisions of the State to receive payments for reasonable removal costs and may authorize advance payments from such account to facilitate such efforts."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself 15 seconds.

With that change, I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. Likewise, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified.

The amendment (No. 687), as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from West Virginia be able to address the Senate for 3 minutes and that the time not be charged to either the bill or any amendments that may pertain to this bill that are contained in the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from West Virginia intend to speak on the subject matter before the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. The Senator does not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator from West Virginia may speak out of order for not to exceed 3 minutes and the time will not be charged under the agreement.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I thank the Presiding Officer very much and I thank the manager of the bill.

(The remarks of Mr. ROCKEFELLER pertaining to the introduction of S. 1529 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 688

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] proposes an amendment numbered 688.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 34, after line 4, insert:

S. 686 is amended by adding the following new subsection to section 103:

"(k) In the expenditure of Federal funds for removal of oil, including, but not limited to, distribution of supplies, construction and other reasonable and appropriate activities, which may be carried out by contract or agreement with private persons, preference shall be given, to the extent feasible and practicable, to those private persons residing or doing business primarily in the area affected by the discharge of oil. This section shall not be considered to restrict the use of the Department of Defense resources.".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is another complication because we are taking a Commerce Committee bill and putting portions of it by amendment into an Environmental Public Works Committee bill.

The Commerce Committee at my request included an amendment which would have enabled an oilspill to be deemed, under the Disaster Act, a national disaster. Not a natural disaster but a national disaster.

When we first had the Exxon spill, I sought a declaration of a national disaster. Had that been granted, all of the capability of the emergency powers of the President would have been immediately available to deal with the disaster in Prince William Sound.

But we found the National Disaster Act does not include oil spills as being eligible for a declaration of national disaster.

In the redrafting of this bill that change in the Disaster Act has been left out. I leave it to others to explain why. And I make this prediction, Mr. President. Any Senators here who go through what we have gone through in terms of this disaster will wish to God the Senate had listened to this Senator and made oilspills eligible for a declaration of a national disaster.

The managers of the bill now indicate that they are not going to accept that. This provision is a portion of what would come about if an oilspill was declared a national disaster. The Stafford Act, which would be triggered by such a declaration, includes a provision that in the cleanup of the effects of a disaster, be it an earthquake, a major fire, a flood, an oilspill—if the Act was amended to include one—the local people would be given preference to the extent feasible and practicable, in the expenditure of funds as far as employment is concerned.

This Senator now has lived through the great earthquake—it was the largest earthquake on the northern continent since the Richter scale was adopted—this disaster, and a series of major floods. I do not know anyone on this floor who has lived through the kind of disasters that I have seen in my lifetime in our State.

And I tell the Senate: This is one of the great tragedies of the expenditures of Federal funds. When those funds come into the State after an event like this, they are under normal Federal procedures. There is competition. There are bids. There are contractors who win those contracts and they proceed to bring in their crews. All the people who have been affected by the disaster are out of work.

There is no economy going on.

After the disaster the major work that is involved in the area affected by the disaster is the cleanup, the removal of the effects of the disaster.

This is a simple request from this Senator and that is if we are not going to make oilspills a national disaster, at least provide that those people who live in the area will, to the extent that it is practicable and feasible, be hired for the jobs that are created in removal.

I know my friend is going to raise the question, Are they going to be qualified?

I will say this to my friend and I will be happy to have a dialog with the Senator from Rhode Island about this, I have not found a job description for someone who is qualified to remove oil from rocks. We have been looking for qualified people to tell us how to get the oil off those beaches. As far as the qualifications are concerned, the qualifications mean they have to be willing to live on a troop ship, they have to be willing to spend 12 hours a day in their job but only be on the beach maybe 6 hours, and be ridiculed by the rest of the country for trying to get oil off rocks, in the first place. "Saturday Night Live" had a parody of them. It was funny to watch. Unless you had been there.

One of my friends said, "What are you so mad about?" I am mad because we have a syndrome in the aftermath of this disaster. There is no question about it. You have not lived through it, so you look at it in a different way than I do. This bill ought to prepare you for some of the problems we have had. I do not expect another disaster in my lifetime, God forbid, like this, but I say the people of the area affected by one ought to be given the jobs when you start spending Federal money, Mr. President. They have no income other than this for a period after a disaster. The removal of the effects of the oilspill, to the extent payments are made from Federal funds, ought to be done in a way that gives preference, to the extent it is practical and feasible, to the people who live in the area. That is all this does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time in opposition?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be designated the person to manage the time in opposition to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr President, first I want to say the amendment of the Senator from Alaska makes a lot of sense. I do not know who can argue with it. I am surprised to hear he has lived, as he said, through two disasters. I did not know about the flood, so several disasters were in his State. He knows what he is talking about.

I have discussed this with him. I wished to have inserted in there the word "qualified" and his response was that indeed the people would be qualified. All these disasters do not involve washing oil off rocks. They involve, as, I presume, in the earthquake disaster of several years ago, construction of rebuilding of harbors, streets, infrastructure, and I can only assume that those who are going to be hired with preference under this, to the extent he says feasible and practicable, also would be to hire those private persons residing and doing business primarily in the area of those qualified private persons. Nobody can argue with that.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not argue with that, but I just would not like to have a standard in this act be different than the Disaster Act. The Disaster Act tracks precisely this language, "* * * preference shall be given," and I am quoting from section 5150 of title 42 of the United States Code, "* * * preference shall be given, to the extent feasible and practicable, to those organizations, firms, and individuals residing or doing business primarily in the area affected by such major disaster or emergency."

I agree with the Senator. We do not want people unqualified doing it. The only question is who is qualified on some of these? I believe we should track the Disaster Act. We would like to trigger the Disaster Act, but at the very least we should incorporate this portion of that act. I agree they have to be qualified.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alaska makes a good point. I think it is always preferable that local personnel be involved in disaster cleanups. I commend the Senator for offering this amendment. I also tend to think the person who will be hired will be qualified. It just makes sense to me if someone is going to hire someone, he is more likely than not going to hire somebody who is qualified. I think this amendment helps improve the bill. I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE. Likewise, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alaska yield back his remaining time?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, how much time do I have?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 4 minutes and 21 seconds.

Mr. STEVENS. May I use that time, Mr. President, to make an inquiry of the managers?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator. I have had some comments about the impact of this bill on a spill similar to the Exxon Valdez. I have a statement that I would like to make to point out that these statements I have been hearing are wrong. There are people saying that if the Exxon Valdez disaster occurred, once this bill becomes law, that all kinds of things would be changed and it would be to the disadvantage of the people in the area affected by such a disaster, which is not true. I would need about 5 or 6 minutes on that. I have another amendment coming up. I could take the time off that but I think we are going to be debating that amendment. As I understant it, there are only 20 minutes on general time under the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the bill, the Chair will state, the debate is controlled by Mr. BAUCUS and Mr. CHAFEE.

Mr. STEVENS. May I make a parliamentary inquiry? According to the agreement, how many more amendments does the Senator from Alaska have the privilege of proposing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This amendment and one more.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, let me use the time now then, if I may, and just say this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What time does the Senator yield?

Mr. STEVENS. Whatever is available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 2½ minutes on this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the Senator from Montana have any time left?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana has 6½ minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Maybe I might indulge him. Let me make this statement, Mr. President. As I indicated, I have heard statements of what might have been the situation had this legislation been in effect at the time the Exxon Valdez went aground on Bligh Reef almost 4½ months ago. Some people misread the concept of strict liability. Exxon's strict liability, meaning liability without fault, under this bill would be $106 million. Under the existing law, it would have been $46 million. There would have been $14 million under TAPS and $32 million under the Clean Water Act.

The fund created by this bill would provide up to $1 billion to pay for the cleanup and damages, instead of the $86 million that would have been available from the existing TAPS fund.

This bill removes the requirement in the existing Clean Water Act that the owner have privity and knowledge before that owner can be held liable for gross negligence or willful misconduct. Under this bill there would be no limit on Exxon's liability because of the fact that, in this Senator's opinion the crew did violate applicable operating and safety standards, and, in addition, there is the allegation of gross negligence on the part of the captain.

This bill does nothing to preempt the State, including my State of Alaska, from imposing unlimited liability for accidents in State waters or unlimited liability for damage in State waters from accidents that occur outside of those waters.

The national fund put into effect by this bill would make $1 billion available for each incident. These funds would be immediately available for use by the Government in responding to a spill. Under existing law, the Government had only $6 million available under the 311(k) account of the Clean Water Act. The Governor would have immediate access to $250,000 from this national fund for use by the State and political subdivisions under the bill. The remaining $999,750,000 in the fund would be available for use by Federal officals to reimburse State, local, and Federal costs, as well as to pay damages.

This bill would put in place a regional team trained to direct and control the response and cleanup. Even if the spill had been an absolute worse case condition, such as the entire cargo of the Exxon Valdez, which was 60 million gallons, this bill would provide the capability to deal with it.

The Government's ability to respond properly and promptly to a spill is further enhanced by this bill because of the contingency plans required by this bill will now have the force and effect of law. The contingency plan must be approved by the Government in order for a ship to even operate, and a court could order Exxon or any other tanker operator to comply with the plan if they would not voluntarily do so. The plan, in order to be approved, must discuss in detail how a tanker operator would handle a spill of the entire cargo. In the past we just had an assumed amount. One of the questions in 1987 that Exxon was asked to answer was what would they do with a spill of 200,000 barrels. The Exxon Valdez spill was 240,000 barrels. This bill says you must have a plan to handle a spill that is as large as the full amount of the cargo, with trained people in place.

Finally, let me point out that the No. 1 defect we found in the old contingency plans is that complacency is the greatest enemy of the environment in the United States. When we first started operating the pipeline we had a plan, we had people in place, we had equipment there and they were subject to drills time after time after time; the tankers went in and out of the Sound without an incident; 5,000 tankers, 6,000 tankers, 7,000, 8,000, almost 9,000 tankers by the time we had an incident. We had not exercised the plans.

I say to anyone who looks at this bill, which is the result of a large amount of hard work—and I compliment the managers of the bill as well as the people who have worked on it from the Commerce Committee—this provides response terms in all areas of this country who will go out and task the operators of these tankers to prove that they can do what their plan says they can do. It will task the operators of the ports to prove that they can respond. It will task the planners to make sure that they have used state-of-the-art technology and that they upgrade these plans periodically. This bill, to me, is the enemy, complacency.

This bill puts into place a mechanism to require that people are capable of doing what these plans say they can do. If the Exxon disaster happened under this plan, we would have had a better opportunity to control that oil when it was in the water, to try to get it out of the water, and a great amount of it would never have hit the beaches of Alaska, Mr. President.

I thank the Senator from Montana for his courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alaska is absolutely correct. Had this legislation been in effect on March 24, it is clear to this Senator, as the Senator from Alaska stated, that we would not be facing near the dimensions of the disaster that we are, unfortunately, up in Alaska, for several reasons. No. 1, it is less likely that the disaster would have occurred. Because of the dramatic, and I mean dramatic, increases in this bill and because privity is no longer a defense, it is much less likely that the Exxon Valdez and Exxon Co. would have been as negligent as they were, which makes it less likely that the incident would have occurred.

No. 2, even if the incident had occurred, because of the billion dollars in the compensation fund that is available and also because we very clearly designate the President's ability to decide very quickly whether he wants to take over or not take over, and because of the response teams and because they have to go through drills as the Senator from Alaska has stated, it is clear to this Senator that the response would have been much more immediate and much more effective. We would not face nearly the disaster that we now have.

I agree with the Senator. He has very clearly and articulately gone down the reasons why had this legislation been in effect on March 24 we would probably be in a much better situation than we now are and would not have had near the same disaster. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. STEVENS. If the Senator will yield, I think those of us who live on coastlines should thank those who do not for the time they have put into consideration of this bill. I cannot imagine an Exxon Valdez arriving in Bozeman or Missoula.

I thank the Senator for the work he has done. I agree with him 100 percent. My only regret is that we, too, are part of the complacent past.

Mr. BAUCUS. I might say to the Senator from Alaska, coincidentally early this week the Burlington Northern derailed and several tank cars fell into Whitefish Lake, MT. We now have an oil spill in Whitefish Lake, MT. As a matter of fact, more than half the lake is covered with slick. This bill too, will help prevent those occurrences and also help with better cleanup. So we have the same problem inland as well as in coastal waters.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has expired on the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment (No. 688) was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask that the time not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the time of the ensuing quorum call will not be charged to either side.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

AMENDMENT NO. 689

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY], and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS], for himself and Mr. KERRY, proposes an amendment numbered 689.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendent is as fcllows:

At the appropriate place insert:

SCIENTIFIC SUPPORT FOR MAJOR COASTAL AND MARINE OIL SPILLS

SEC. 20X. (a) REQUIREMENT FOR SCIENTIFIC SUPPORT.—The Secretary of Commerce shall maintain a staff of experts trained in oceanography, marine biology, chemistry, computer and environmental sciences to respond to major oil spills in coastal and marine waters. Selected members of this staff shall be co-located with Coast Guard District offices and available to assist Federal On-Scene Coordinators in the discharge of their duties.

(b) FUNCTIONS OF THE SCIENTIFIC SUPPORT TEAM.—The functions of the scientific support team referred to subsection (a) shall be as follows:

(1) Provide for coordination of scientific activity and serve as a clear point of contact between the scientific community and the Federal On-Scene Coordinator during major oil spills;

(2) Forecast the movement and spreading of oil spills in the marine environment;

(3) Develop a computerized atlas of the environmental sensitivity of the coastline of the United States to oil pollution, indicating priorities for the protection of especially sensitive or vulnerable sections of the coast in the event of spill impacts;

(4) Develop a state-of-the-art mobile chemical laboratory for rapid deployment to the scene of major spills for the purpose of determining the composition and degradation of spilled oil and its effects on fisheries and other natural resources;

(5) Conduct systematic analyses of the environmental consequences of various cleanup techniques for the purpose of improving future responses;

(6) Develop computerized methods for managing scientific and operational information during major spills.

(7) Assist in the training of state and local government personnel in the scientific aspect of spill response.

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF FUNDING.—For the purposes of this section, there are authorized to be made available to the Department of Commerce, $5,000,000 for each of fiscal years 1989 through 1999. Any such funds shall be provided from the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund in accordance with the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act (43 U.S.C. 1651 et seq.).

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may use out of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this amendment would create a scientific support group in the Department of Commerce and direct the Secretary of Commerce to maintain the staff of experts trained in oceanography, marine biology, computer science, and other fields related to the response to oilspills.

Again, I hope one of these days, I will be able to bring to the Senate, and ask the Commerce and other committees that are interested in this subject to listen to, the NOAA scientists that have been at work in the Prince William Sound. I can tell the Senate I know of no more dedicated people in the Federal Government than the people involved in this pursuit of trying to acquire knowledge of how to prevent these disasters, but further, of how to measure the effects of an oilspill, to mitigate those effects, and to generally determine on a scientific basis the impact of an oil spill on marine life of all types.

This bill provides for a regional response team, as I mentioned previously, in each region of the country, including my State. The core of that group presently exists in the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Hazardous Materials Response Branch. It is that group that played such a vital role in the response to the Exxon Valdez, and as I have just pointed out to the managers of the bill, at one time in the past few weeks they were in Alaska, almost all of them, working on the aftermath of the Exxon Valdez disaster.

Then, on that weekend, we had a disaster in Rhode Island, in Delaware, and in Texas. Our scientific capability is so thin that the people from the team in the Prince William Sound and the Gulf of Alaska dealing with this spill that we had were flown to Rhode Island, some of them to Delaware, and some of them to Texas.

My point is we do not have today the depth that we must have in trained people in these fields to respond to future spills that may occur.

This amendment would enable us to do throughout the country what, thank God, we have already done in Alaska through grants that have gone to the University of Alaska in the past, by using in satellite technology, and buoys that placed in the Alaska current. We had knowledge of where the current was going to go, and were able to predict where the oil would eventually go by virtue of the continued and inexorable drift of the waters out of the Prince William Sound. We knew the oil would drift southwest down the Alaska peninsula, and then, as most people do not realize, that drift turns north, and goes up into the Bering Sea, the Chukchi Sea and the Arctic Ocean. The studies that have been done in my area prove that the Prince William Sound delivers to the Pacific 20 percent more fresh water annually than the Mississippi delivers to the Gulf of Mexico.

These are the kind of studies that we ought to have as part of the response team. I claim no pride in authorship in this amendment because it was drafted by the people who are the scientific people in the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration to emphasize the fact that this group needs support. And we need the support of such a scientific group in the event of any disaster of this type in the future.

This group would provide the capability for onsite determination of the chemical composition of the oil, and what is even more important, it would be part of the group that would determine whether or not dispersants could be used on the oil, what type of dispersants, under what conditions, and what safety measures would have to be involved in order to protect the environment, no matter what substance would be used to deal with an oil spill.

That, I might say to the Senate, is probably the key problem coming out of our oil spill as everyone knows. There was an argument for about 24 hours as to what dispersants to use, whether to use dispersants, and the control of the spill from the Exxon Valdez was lost while that argument was going on.

Mr. President, last I mention this: I was sitting in my office one night when I received a call that indicated the oil from the Exxon Valdez was found in Chignik Bay.

Now, that is down the Alaska peninsula; it would be about 1,000 miles from where the Exxon Valdez went aground on Bligh Reef. It would have meant that the oil was moving about five times as fast as we had computed it would. I could not believe it. We called NOAA, and NOAA chartered a floatplane and took some people down and made a test of the oil down in Chignik Bay, and I regret to tell the Senate that their conclusion was that someone had taken advantage of the situation and decided they did not have to go into port to empty their bilge since there was so much oil in the water. The oil team proved the oil was from the bilges of a very large vessel, but it did not come from the Exxon Valdez.

All I say to the Senate is that the scientific capability of this group is vital to any consideration in the future of oil spills, that the Senate Commerce Committee believes that NOAA should be the center of the team that is envisioned by the bill before us, and this amendment is here to reflect that goal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield myself 5 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May we have order in the Senate.

The Senator from Montana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alaska very correctly points out that NOAA is a premier agency in the U.S. Government. I, for many years, although I am not directly involved with NOAA, have always been impressed by NOAA. I do not have a strong basis for that. It has just been my sense that NOAA has been one of the better agencies and knows what it is doing and provides very valuable scientific evidence to this country.

The bill before us, Mr. President, provides for $25 million in the fund to be used for research and development to look into spill prevention, response, and spill containment, recovery of oil. It is a very necessary R&D effort that we have to undertake, if we are going to minimize damages of another Exxon Valdez.

We very much need this effort. Twenty-five million dollars in the bill is dedicated annually for this effort. The bill also provides that the President shall decide how to conduct that research and development effort, which agencies to use, et cetera. It is clear to this Senator, and mostly for the reasons outlined by the Senator from Alaska, that the President, in many cases, will utilize NOAA, because it will be necessary. NOAA has expertise in many areas. It is probably true that other agencies also have expertise.

The bill is drafted in a way to give the President discretion to call upon different agencies, depending upon the need; that is, whether more emphasis should be dedicated to recovery, prevention, to materials. One could conjure up all kinds of different possibilities.

So I ask the Senator if he will reconsider pushing this amendment, because it just seems to the manager of the bill that it makes more sense to give the President this discretion, including NOAA, so that we can have an R&D effort that is coordinated, an R&D effort that is not duplicative.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAUCUS. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Montana, the manager of the bill, this question: Is it not the intention of both the Environment and Public Works Committee and the Commerce Committee—I think the Senate as a whole—that we not establish any new kind of entity in terms of the exercise of the power that is granted to the President to put together the research and development capability under this bill?

Mr. BAUCUS. Well, essentially, I do not think it is helpful to categorize this as either a new power or additional power. But it is clear we need additional effort, because the Exxon Valdez did occur. It is also very clear that it is something in the magnitude of $25 million which is necessary for more R&D in this general area.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask another question, Mr. President, of the Senator from Montana?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. The bill says, The President shall establish a research and development program on scientific and operational aspects of spill prevention, response, containment and recovery which shall, at a minimum, give priority to on-water oil recovery and treatment; prevention of loss from and away from vessels, et cetera.

I support that entirely. But it could be interpreted as saying that such powers would give the President the authority to create a new kind of entity, a national response entity, being entirely independent from the existing agencies such as NOAA, EPA, et cetera. That is not the intention of the committee, is it?

Mr. BAUCUS. The Senator is correct. That is not the intention of the committee.

Mr. STEVENS. My friends in NOAA should know that it is the intention of the Senate, and that the discretion is with the President, of course, but that in carrying out this research and development program to the maximum extent possible, the President should utilize the existing expertise of the agencies we have already created and funded and not duplicate them by creating a new scientific entity or to take powers away from them to transfer to some entity like, for instance, the National Science Foundation.

Mr. BAUCUS. That is correct. That is not the intention here.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I will speak when the Senator is finished.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. I just want to say to the distinguished Senator from Alaska that I share his high regard for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, NOAA. As I mentioned previously, as perhaps he remembers, a close friend of mine has been just named—a fellow Rhode Islander, Dr. John Kanows. So no one has higher esteem for that organization than I have.

As the Senator from Alaska pointed out, the President, for sure, will turn to NOAA and other existing agencies. The idea is not to set up a new one, but to turn to the existing agencies to carry out the provisions of section 205 and section 311 on page 63 of the bill, S. 686.

I also point out that we have set up, as the Senator from Alaska has noted, seven response teams across the Nation.

They will have to draw on the scientific expertise of those existing agencies. So I think we have covered the concerns of the Senator, and I hope that he will follow the suggestion of the majority manager of this legislation by withdrawing his amendment.

Mr. STEVENS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I understand what the Senators from Montana and Rhode Island are saying. I personally would like to assure that NOAA has the lead role in this scientific endeavor by naming them the scientific support group and requiring the Senator to put together that capability within Commerce. It is true, I assume the President could follow that course, should he choose to do so. I will attempt to have him do so. I do not know whether he will or not, but I intend to make that recommendation.

It is my belief that if we would listen to the people who know the oceans, if we would listen to them, not only in terms of what happens after there is a disaster, but even before, we would reduce the size of these tankers.

We would change the means of transportation of some of the oil. We are going to have the oil. Those of us from Alaska are accused often of trying to be prodevelopment. We are just realists. My State has 80 percent of the Outer Continental Shelf of the United States. It has probably 80 percent of the potential future discoverable and producible oil in the United States. We are going to be affected by oil and gas development no matter what we do.

We believe that we ought to have the best minds available and the best trained people available to deal with oilspill prevention and containment. In my judgment, that group is NOAA.

But at the urging of the managers of the bill, and on the basis of the statement that they have made concerning the intent of the bill, Mr. President, I desire to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senator may withdraw the amendment.

The Chair hears no objection. The amendment is withdrawn.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that the time not be charged against either side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the time consumed in the quorum call will not be charged.

The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

AMENDMENT NO. 690

(Purpose: To increase the liability for certain oilspills)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, Senator DOLE, and Senator GORTON, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM], for himself, Mr. DOLE, and Mr. GORTON, proposes an amendment numbered 690.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 14, line 23, and page 15, line 11 strike "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

On page 15, line 3, strike "$300" and insert in lieu thereof "$600".

On page 15, lines 8, 11, and 13, and page 16, line 23, strike "$100,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$350,000,000".

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Which of the two amendments under the order is the Senator now proposing?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The one without a time limit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thanks the Senator.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the limits in this bill, while an improvement over the current situation, are woefully inadequate.

But let me preface that by saying that I want to commend those who have provided the leadership in bringing this bill to the floor. It was not an easy task. It was a task that indicated that they were prepared to shoulder a burden, to meet some challenges, to meet some opposition, and to recognize the need to provide some further financial responsibility than we presently have under the law.

I want to say that Senator MITCHELL, Senator BAUCUS, and Senator CHAFEE are to be commended for their efforts and for their leadership. I think all of us in this body and the country as a whole owe them a great debt of gratitude.

Having said that, I still make the point that though they have improved this greatly, I think that the limts are still inadequate. And that is the reason for my amendment.

Let us look at the limits with the example of the Exxon Valdez accident. The way the bill is currently written, a huge tanker like the Exxon Valdez would have capped its liability at about $55 million.

Now, $55 million is obviously totally inadequate. This one tanker lost one-fiftieth of the oil it was carrying that day and still managed to do enough damage to the environment to require a billion dollar-plus cleanup. That is 20 times what its liability cap would be under this bill at $50 million. We raise that cap to $350 million.

It needs to be raised. We need higher caps because it is too difficult to prove negligence in these cases. There are some rights to go beyond the caps in the bill if you can prove gross negligence or willful misconduct, but we would be in court for years resolving the issue of liability and trying to prove those two elements which are a matter of law.

The companies would prefer to postpone paying and be in the courts so the cases are likely to drag on and on and meanwhile the spill would not be cleaned up. It is too long to wait for the cleanup. The only way to get the cases resolved quickly is to impose liability with caps and get the cleanups started. Imposing strict liability will reinstill corporate discipline and help deter future spills.

As my colleagues, Senators CHAFEE, LIEBERMAN, GRAHAM, and DURENBERGER, point out in the report on this bill, cleanup is no substitute for the prevention that is encouraged by the presence of liability. The proponents of the current liability provisions will make several arguments—or they could have but I believe that they are now prepared to accept this amendment. I am not going to address myself to what those arguments might have been because I am certain that we have resolved the issue.

I feel, Mr. President, that the provisions that we are proposing today are much more in line with the world of reality in which we live. I am pleased that the managers are prepared to accept the amendment, it is my understanding.

Just to bring to the attention of all of our colleagues, the amendment will raise from $500 per gross ton to $1,000 per gross ton for oil tankers. It will raise the amounts from $300 per ton to $600 per ton for other vessels, and will raise the amount for facilities from $100 million to $350 million.

I hope the amendment can be adopted promptly.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I am a little disappointed that the Senator from Ohio has amended his original amendment, which was talking in terms of vessels and tankers that import oil. His original amendment would have raised the limits from $500 a ton in the bill—it is currently $150—it would raise it just a little bit to $2,500 a ton.

I have fought for an oil import fee in this Congress, in both the House and the Senate, since 1973 when the first oil crisis occurred. We are getting close to getting an oil import fee with what we are doing to these liability limitations on tankers. It is gradually going to raise the price of oil where it is going to get to the point where we are not going to import any oil.

I am happy with that. I would like the price of oil at $50 a barrel. It would really help my State of Louisiana.

Who do we think is going to pay these insurance costs? Do you think Exxon or the owners of other oil tankers? Of course not. It is going to be the consumer who will pay for the oil, the consumer who imports heating oil for the Northeast and imports crude oil from the refinery.

So I am a little disappointed that they decided to remove the limits on liability from $2,500 a ton in the first amendment down to, I think, $1,000 a ton. But, boy, we are getting a little bit closer to raising the price of imported oil. And I am certainly strongly supportive of that. I would like to raise the price of imported oil to $80 a barrel. We would not be doing any importing.

Guess what that would do to the price of domestic oil? I would like to have that. Louisiana, Texas, and Oklahoma would like to have that.

We are coming real close to putting a lot of tankers and vessels out of business, and that is fine with me, because if we do that, we are not going to be able to import oil anymore. We import 45 percent of what we use in this country. If we gouge them just a little more, they are not going to do it anymore.

Half of the oil trade that is done by tanker is done by private companies, not by the Exxons and Texacos and Shells, but by private carriers, companies with two or three ships.

Could you imagine the financial responsibility for a company that has two ships, what they are going to have to do when we get the limits up so high that they cannot afford insurance? They are not going to be in business. If they could get insurance at these levels, they are going to pass the cost of the product on to the consumer. Instead of paying $20 a barrel, they may be paying $30 a barrel. I have no problem with that, because I think it would help the domestic oil industry. So as high as we can raise these limits, the more difficult it is for companies to get insurance, the better off my constituents are going to be.

Are you going to tell the companies that have one ship or two ships that they are going to have to have, on a 100,000 ton tanker—let us see, at $1,000 a ton, that is $100 million of liability on that ship.

If they can get it, they are going to pass it on to the consumer. It will raise the price of oil.

If they cannot get it, they will not be in business and we will not be importing oil.

What that does to the domestic price of oil I am very happy with. I am delighted. Because it helps our State, which is literally on its knees because of the oil prices.

So bear in mind the current limitation on vessels, which is working, is $150 a ton. The first amendment of the Senator from Ohio was $2,500 a ton: slight increase.

Now it is $1,000 a ton.

The House of Representatives' measure is at $500 a ton. So, as high as we can get these limits and make it more difficult for foreign crude oil to come into this country, more difficult for importers to import crude oil into this country, I am delighted. This is as close to an oil import fee as I think we will ever get. So I support it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is there a time limitation on this amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is none.

Mr. STEVENS. I think we ought to get this in focus so it is not misunderstood back in my State. We have unlimited liability. This is talking about limitations on liability under Federal law.

For instance, the Exxon Valdez, Exxon is going to pay as I said yesterday in my judgment, over $2 billion. Two billion dollars as a result of that incident.

It is not affected by the limitations under any of these laws and would not be, as I said earlier today, because of the negligence and the violations of the Federal regulations.

The Senator from Ohio is raising the amounts under the bill, as before the Senate, which already raised the amounts under existing law. But I must tell my good friend, the Senator from Louisiana, my good friend, I think this is sort of tilting with a windmill in some fashion except for the insurance requirement.

When a person has unlimited liability, as I understand it, when he goes to get insurance to try to cover the potential liability, there is an attempt to define the risk. They insure against the possible exposure and probably have a maximum under the insurance policy.

This says that there is a limitation of liability on operators of tankers and, as I understand it, it would be $1,000 a ton.

Mr. BREAUX. Would the Senator yield on that point.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes.

Mr. BREAUX. The point I am making is, one, with unlimited liability the company could go bankrupt and get out of the liability. With limitations as much as $1,000 a ton, they have to show financial liability. That means we are going to have to show an insurance policy in effect, a letter of credit for $100 million, money in the bank that has been set aside or taken out of operations for $100 million on a 100,000 ton tanker. That is the difference.

With unlimited liability they can go bankrupt and avoid it. This requires these ships to have responsibility proved. They have to put the money up front. And one-half of the tankers that are from individual, small companies, I doubt they are going to be able to do that, which means they will not be able to operate, which means they will not be able to bring in imported oil, which means we will have a higher price for domestic oil and I agree with that.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my point is, if we look at the bill, the Senator from Ohio would change $500 per gross ton or $10 million, whichever is greater, for the tanker. The Senator from Ohio can correct me, but I do not think he has changed that figure of $10 million? On page 15 of the bill he changes $300 and inserts $600. And it remains a $500,000 limit under the bill.

Is the Senator from Ohio listening? I am trying to understand what the Senator is doing with this amendment. Does the Senator change the figure $10 million, on page 14, or $500,000 on page 15, line 3?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The answer is "no."

Mr. STEVENS. Pardon?

Mr. METZENBAUM. No. The only changes we make have to do with $300 to $600—the $500 to $1,000, and the $100 million to $350 million.

Mr. STEVENS. And this amendment does not change the $100 million limitation on line 15, page 6? It does change the $100 million limitation on 8 and 11 and 13, on page 16, to $350 million; is that correct?

Mr. METZENBAUM. It is my understanding the Wilson amendment changed those figures.

Mr. STEVENS. The Wilson amendment changed the other figures, but did not change the per tonnage limitation. The Senator is raising the per tonnage limitation; is that right?

Mr. METZENBAUM. That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS. I am trying to make the point it is still sort of tilting with a windmill because I do not know of any State law that would have limitations of liability. We have unlimited liability. Would the Senator from Louisiana inform this Senator, Mr. President, is Louisiana law unlimited liability under State law, also?

Mr. BREAUX. That is correct. Also, there was no financial liability required to be shown by the investor. Under this legislation they would have to show an insurance policy, letter of credit, or money in the bank.

Mr. STEVENS. That is where I am going. The impact of this, as far as ultimate recovery, is in terms of the ability of the entity involved to show that it would be capable of meeting the strict liability concept. I have nothing against insurance companies but I think my advice to people who are involved in risk underwriting is to get ready. This is going to increase insurance costs. It will not increase the ultimate protection for the environment or for the land areas that will be affected by this.

I do not disagree with the Senator from Ohio from the point of view of consistency, but I have had long talks with him, Mr. President, off the floor and here during quorum calls. We will address the other matter later.

I think if we look at the rest of the terms of this bill in terms of financial responsibility, we do not have a capability of dealing with foreign operators. This is going to put on the domestic fleet and on the domestic operators an insurance requirement under the financial responsibility section which will be to the boon of insurance carriers.

I say to my good friend, as long as he has unlimited liability under State law, and as long as this is only going to hit domestic carriers and domestic entities, why should we increase the insurance costs that are ultimately paid by the consumers of the United States?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alaska yield?

Mr. STEVENS. I have addressed a question to my good friend. I am happy to yield to my friend for the purpose of responding to a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska has the floor and yields to the Senator from Ohio for response to a question.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have to take issue with my colleague about whether or not it adds protection for the environment. Certainly, when we increase the financial obligation we also increase the concern of that party which would be liable and, therefore, hope they will take more preventive measures than have been taken to date in order to see to it that there be no claims asserted. Because it is not a question of seeing how many dollars can be obtained, it is a question of protecting the environment.

When my colleague says "I do not see how this is going to help protect the environment" I would have to differ with him on that point.

With respect to the question of increasing the insurance costs, there is not much question about the fact that when we increase liability, if somebody wants to buy insurance, it is going to cost them more. I believe that the American people are not going to be that panicky about that extremely incidental item. Whether it comes out of profits or whether it comes out of increased costs, I do not know.

I do know this. I know that when the Valdez occurrence became a reality, I know it was not a question of how much insurance they had. But I know that Exxon and the other oil companies participating there raised their prices immediately. And not by the incidental amount that insurance might cost, but they raised their prices 25 and 30 cents a gallon. And they have stayed there.

So the American people were forced to pay for the cleanup, notwithstanding the fact that they had no responsibility, notwithstanding the fact the American people had no problem with it. They had not participated.

So what we are here saying is that those affected by destruction of the environment are entitled to financial protection, and if it costs them something additional to buy insurance for that purpose, so be it. But I think the ultimate question is what we are doing to see to it that the companies accept their responsibility to protect those areas in which they are dealing with oil?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his response. My mind goes back to 1973 when I stood here on the floor and argued for the Alaska pipeline liability fund. We had complaints from many people that if the Alaska pipeline was built and oil was transported by tankers out of Valdez—at the time, we were talking about 40,000 to 60,000 barrel tankers; we are talking a lot bigger now—the question of insurance came up. We determined that it would cost the users of oil less money to establish a fund. Congress mandated the creation of the fund which was to meet the cost of any contingency related to the transportation of Alaskan oil from the North Slope, but we specifically did not put any limitation on liability of a party at fault. This bill has no limitation of liability, either in terms of gross negligence or violation of regulations of the Federal Government.

The point I am trying to make to the Senator is, unlimited liability exists, so what good does it do to say that there is a limitation of liability and to have the people who are carrying this oil be required under the financial responsibility sections of the bill to prove that they can meet that expanded liability area. They only do it through insurance, and that insurance is going to be paid for by the users. If you have unlimited liability, as we do under State law and under the bills that came out of the committee, the insurance costs are less to meet the strict liability problems, and the insurance costs, in terms of the unlimited liability provisions, are a matter of proof to the insurance company of what is the exposure of the risk. I have to tell the Senator, I think the committee's approach was the better one.

While I am on this, Mr. President, the Alaska pipeline liability fund was a good idea. I am amazed that it has taken so long—16 years—for the rest of the country to catch up with them. We now are taking our fund that was mandated by the Alaska Pipeline Act and transferring that money to the national fund so the national fund has money in it to start with.

Incidentally, as I said before, and I want to emphasize so the RECORD shows it, we have not objected to it, I have not, others might, because the conversations I had with the distinguished majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, and the agreements we reached to be carried out by this bill that Alaska's future production gets a credit for that payment into the fund. I think everybody should understand that. There is a fee imposed on every barrel of oil produced or utilized in the United States under this bill to create this new fund, but our producers have created a fund that has not been needed. There is almost $250 million in there. It will be transferred to this fund, and the compromise we have reached is that there is a prepayment, in effect, for future production until the amount of the deposit is actually made is reached in terms of the production of Alaskan oil.

I assume my friends, the managers of the bill, agree with my interpretation of it. That is the intent of it. The point is this: We paid for our insurance in terms of strict liability through the fund in the past. It is inadequate now. Costs have increased. The Exxon Valdez shows we were too conservative in estimating the cost of recovery of oil.

The Senator from Ohio says do not be too conservative in stating the upper limits of strict liability. I do not disagree with that, but I urge him to understand there is no insurance for that here. What we are talking about is we are not providing insurance. The fund itself does not come into play in terms of this, as I understand it and the managers and the Senator from Ohio can correct me, his amendment does not affect the payments from the fund in the event that the fund is called on to respond to any liability for removal of costs.

I hope, I say to the Senator from Montana, I have learned the verbiage of the bill, the removal of the costs of this bill are not affected by the requirement. The only thing this affects is, in fact, the proof of financial responsibility that is required by someone that comes under the act and is involved in transportation, et cetera. It does not affect the amount of money that is going to come out of the fund. It does not affect the ultimate liability of a carrier, or producer of oil. It only affects strict liability limits, which, in my State, do not exist. I am not going to object to the amendment.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. We are prepared to accept the amendment. I would just as soon move along here if we can.

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, the bill on the floor today reported out of the Environment and Public Works Committee dramatically increases liability. It dramatically increases the responsibility placed upon tankers, upon oil companies to minimize the occurrence of another Exxon Valdez. But the bill out of this committee can always be improved upon. The Senator from Ohio I think has done just that.

The original committee bill I think had liability limits somewhat lowered because the committee was also looking at the other body, the House of Representatives. The Senator from Maine, the majority leader, for 8 years has attempted to pass an oilspill bill. He has had a difficult time in large respect because the other body has a very different view on what should be contained in that bill. The basic difference between this body and that body has been preemption of State law. The other body has been opposed to Senate efforts which would prohibit preemption. The other body would like preemption. The other body would like to make it difficult for the States to have their own separate liability laws. It has been a very difficult issue in dealing with the other body.

Liability limits, too, in this bill are significantly higher than the liability limits in the bill in the other body. Nevertheless, I think proper public policy is to place the liability limits about the level posed by the Senator from Ohio. All things in the perfect world, if the United States were writing this legislation only, I think those are the limits we should have in the law. It is my hope that when we pass this legislation, and I think we will very shortly, and when we go to conference on this bill that the bill we will face on the other side will be a bill that is probably closer to this bill than has been the case in previous years. It is my hope and expectation, and I may be wrong, it will not be the first time that I am wrong, but it is my judgement that the bill that finally passes the House of Representatives will be a bill that is much closer to this bill than have earlier bills been that passed that body.

I see the distinguished Senator from Louisiana here who knows this legislation very well. He served in the other body. He may have a different view. He is cognizant of the differences we have yet to work out when we go to conference.

Having said all that, I support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I think it is an improvement upon the bill. I do not think the additional insurance costs will be that great, and I do think additional liability will increase the probability that the oil companies, the vessels, the tanker companies will go the extra mile, as it were, to take extra precautions to minimize the occurrance of another incident like the Exxon Valdez. I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further debate on the amendment?

The amendment (No. 690), as was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have another amendment, but before offering it I would like to discuss the matter a few minutes with the Senator from Alaska. Under those circumstances, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we go into recess, unless the managers have some other business, and it not be charged against the time of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator suspend.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am sorry. I said "recess." I meant quorum call.

President pro tempore. Without objection, the time consumed for the call of the quorum will not be charged. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without ojection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT NO. 691

(Purpose: To increase the liability for certain oilspills)

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] proposes an amendment numbered 691.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. . INCREASE IN LIABILITY FOR CERTAIN OILSPILLS, EXTENSION OF LIABILITY WITHOUT FAULT TO AREAS OF THE ARCTIC.—At the appropriate place in the liability provision of this bill, insert the following:

"The owner or operator of any facility, the holder of any lease, right-of-way or permit for oil exploration, development, or transportation shall be liable, under this Act, for all damages, and removal costs, sustained by any person, that arise out of or directly result from the discharge or substantial threat of discharge of oil from—

"(A) the Trans-Alaska Pipeline;

"(B) fields or reservoirs supplying oil to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline; and

"(C) onshore or offshore oil and gas exploration, development or transportation activities in areas on Alaska's North Slope, including State submerged lands and the Outer Continental Shelf of the Beaufort Sea and the Chukchi Sea.

"Notwithstanding Section 204(a)(2) of the Trans-Alaska Oil Pipeline Act of 1973 (Public Law 93-153), liability under this Section shall be limited to $350,000,000 for any one incident. The unpaid portion of any claim that exceeds $350,000,000 may be asserted and adjudicated under other applicable Federal or State law. Liability for such damages shall be in accord with the ordinary rules of negligence.".

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, this amendment follows the previous amendment. It provides for a $350 million limit with respect to liability in connection with the Alaska pipeline.

The Senator from Alaska previously pointed out that it is unlimited liability in Alaska now as far as the pipeline is concerned, but the fact is that in order to maintain that liability you must prove negligence. This law contemplates liability without negligence and so the $350 million would increase the obligation and responsibility of the corporation.

Furthermore, it should be pointed out that there is a $1 billion fund, but that $1 billion fund is usable, as I understand it, in the event the corporation is not called upon directly to pay sums due. So that under these circumstances the $350 million would place the responsibility where it belongs, and that is on the corporation.

The argument is made that it will cost more to buy this much insurance. I recognize that, but the fact is I think those who are owners of the Alyeska pipeline are very much in a position to cover the cost of that insurance.

The argument is made it will come directly out of the pockets of the consumers. I am not prepared to accept that because even though the oil industry is not very competitive, there is still an element of competition that exists in the industry and you just cannot pass on costs that one company incurs as compared to what other companies incur.

It is my understanding the managers of the bill are prepared to accept this amendment. I think it conforms with the earlier one that was accepted, and I think it makes a good bill a better one.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me some time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, this is a different kind of amendment. I am not going to oppose it. I really do not support it. I do not have any objection to the committee taking it but I think people ought to understand what it does.

The Alaska pipeline probably has been overengineered, overstudied more than any pipeline in the country. It is the only pipeline in the country that has the capability of having a massive spill. I am informed that with the 10 pumping stations along this pipeline, 150 to 160 separate shutoff valves, the maximum exposure at any time—we are talking about strict liability now, an act-of-God kind of liability—would be 50,000 barrels. That is a lot of oil; do not misunderstand me. Under our law, if there is any negligence at all, it is unlimited liability. If there is no negligence, it is strictly an act of God. The question comes down to what is this fund for.

I want to make sure the Senator from Ohio understands my position. The producers in my State will have contributed $250 million to this liability fund. As I mentioned before, in lieu of requiring insurance, we created the fund at the time the pipeline was created. The strict liability under the Pipeline Act is $50 million. Because of the fact that the producers had contributed the money to build up the fund, the Pipeline Act said you pay the first $50 million and after that, in the event of strict liability, the fund pays the damages.

With the throughput of this pipeline, 2 million barrels a day, there is no question about the financial responsibility of the people involved. The pipeline itself is worth over $1 billion. The question comes down again to insurance.

As I understand the Senator's amendment, it has no impact whatsoever on the removal of the oil in the event of a spill. That will be removed one way or the other. We have a $1 billion fund, and we have the Alaska pipeline. Under State law, the Alyeska pipeline would be responsible for removal. The difficulty is this: The Senator's amendment moves strict liability from $50 million to $350 million, a sevenfold increase in the amount of insurance that will be required by the Alyeska pipeline consortium created by Federal law, mandated that it exist for the owner companies producing oil on the North Slope to maintain this pipeline.

This will prevent anyone from owning it. So it is a separate company. It is not a corporate veil. It is a veil created by Congress and that pipeline company has expenditures for running the pipeline and complying with Federal instructions concerning the contingencies that might occur, and revenues from the individual companies as they put their oil in and ship it through.

It has the pipeline. So it has an investment that almost is paid off now. It has financial responsibility. This says carry insurance of $350 million, seven times the amount you are now carrying. I say on this one, again, why should I represent and object on the basis of the people in the south 48 that are going to burn all of this gasoline and oil? This is not going to affect my State. My State, I am assured, has protection under this act. It has protection under State law. In the event there is any disruption that leads to a spill, whether it is an act of God or negligence, I am convinced my people in Alaska are protected under Federal and State law, that the removal will take place, all of the oil will be picked up, and it will be paid for.

The question here is what is the threshold for getting to the national fund that is created by this act by the Alyeska Pipeline Co. In the case of an act-of-God spill? This raises it to $350 million from $50 million. That $350 million is going to be paid for by the users of the oil. It is not going to be impacted by Alaskans. It is not in any way going to be impacted by a failure to react and bring about a recovery of my State in the event a catastrophe occurs.

I again raise the questions as I did before. Why do we insist on fueling insurance company profits? That is what this is. The insurance company is going to be paying annually for the moneys involved in this. It is not going to affect liability. It is not going to affect cleanup. It is not going to affect the State of Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, Mr. METZENBAUM.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to respond and say it certainly is going to affect liability because under the bill as presently drafted, the absolute liability is limited to $50 million. What we are doing here is we are saying that you do not have to prove fault if the damages are in excess of that. I believe that to be a very, very relevant factor.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Let us assume it is an act of God. A lightning bolt comes down and strikes the pipeline in my State. Fifty thousand barrels spill and it is going to cost $200 million to clean it up. Under this bill as it is presently written, the first $100 million is the responsibility of the pipeline company. The second $100 million is the responsibility of the fund as I understand it. That is strict liability now. Am I correct?

I ask the manager of the bill. Is there a $100 million limitation on the facility now?

Mr. BAUCUS. I might answer the Senator's question. The last amendment was $350 million.

Mr. STEVENS. That is this amendment.

Mr. BAUCUS. No. The last amendment we agreed to offered by the Senator from Ohio increased the ceiling of limit to $350 million.

Mr. STEVENS. So does this. Why do we not need this one then? That is the question.

Mr. CHAFEE. That is the good question.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the last amendment did not touch the pipeline, and that is why we are touching it now.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator from Alaska is stating a very valid point. It is my understanding that the managers of the bill think there is presently a $350 million limit by reason of my previous amendment. The Senator from Ohio is not certain of that point, but is not prepared to challenge it, and feels in order to make certain there is the $350 million limit or the $350 million obligation this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent we have 5 more minutes on this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Chair.

It is not my understanding the Alaska amendment touched the Alaska pipeline. If it does, this is redundant. If it did not, I still will not oppose the Senator, if he wants to proceed. And I do not oppose the Alaska amendment.

I just again say why do you want to raise the increased cost, raise the cost of Alaskan oil to your consumers? We are trying to keep the price of oil down I thought. This only raises the price of oil. It does not affect the cleanup, and with due respect, Mr. President, the $50 million under the current law is a limit that was set in recognition of the fact that the producers of the oil created the $250 million fund.

We said you pay the first $50 million, then you go to the fund. Now this is a national bill, and in the law, the bill that came out of committee said you pay the first $100 million; then you go to the fund.

The Senator has raised that level of strict liability for the operator, and I have to tell you, if it is struck by lightning that is not your fault.

The question is, should the operator pay redundant costs? It is not Alaskans who are paying it. It is the consumers of Alaskan oil.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, if that bolt of lightning strikes, the question is who pays for the damages? Do the people of Alaska pay for the damage? Do we come to the Congress and ask them to provide a special piece of legislation asking the American people to pay for it? The fact is that this pipeline is a very, very profitable enterprise. And, therefore, some of us feel—and I am sure the Senator from Alaska agrees—that if there are to be losses, the losses ought to be borne by those people who are doing business.

If there were no pipeline, there would not be any risk to those who live somewhere near the pipeline. But if there is a bolt of lightning that strikes, then it is a fact that the pipeline owners ought to be responsible.

That is all we are saying. If we are making them responsible for the facilities generally in this country, and I recognize the point made by the manager of the bill, that they think it is already covered. But I just think there is not any question that those who own the pipeline ought to pay the costs. The argument keeps coming back about whether or not the consumers are going to wind up paying for it. Well, they may or they may not.

If Alyeska and its ownership companies are in a position to pass on the costs, they will do it; just as they raise prices generally, they will not have any reservation to raise those cost prices. If there are competitive forces that do not make that possible out there, then the costs will not be passed on, and it will come out of the profits of the corporation.

I am not particularly concerned at this moment whether or not it comes from the profits of the corporation, although I do believe they are very able to pay those costs. Therefore, my feeling is that we ought to see to it for those who may be damaged. Certainly the Senator from Alaska understands, as it is his constituents about whom we are speaking.

Therefore, I am very pleased that he is not prepared to oppose the amendment, but only raises a question with respect to what costs may be passed on to the consumers of this country who are represented in the main by those of use who do not come from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I yield 1 minute on my time.

Mr. STEVENS. I thank the Senator from Ohio for thinking about it, but I do not want the record to indicate that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio provides my constituents with 1 penny more protection than the bill already presents. It will not increase anything to my people or to the land of Alaska. That is there in this bill.

The question is, what is the threshold in the event of that lightning striking? There is $1 billion fund, a $1 billion pipeline. I can assure you we can clean up any oilspill that happens from a pipeline that has the potential risk of spilling 50,000 barrels with $2 billion.

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio does not change that fact. It says that the pipeline company's threshold liability is $350 million. That will be met; it is a proof requirement that they can meet it. I know they can meet it. They have a billion-dollar pipeline. Our law will go to that pipeline itself for the cost of repair, if we have to do it.

This does not add to the availability of funds to clean up and remove the oil. It says, prove that you have the capability to meet that threshold of $350 million. Again, I say the insurance company is going to get rich.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. How much time does the Senator from Ohio have left?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Four minutes, fifty seconds.

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. I want to point out that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio at the bottom of line 14 includes, apparently, offshore facilities—including offshore facilities in the Outer Continental Shelf up in Alaska. The rest of the bill says unlimited liability on Outer Continental Shelf activities.

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio puts a cap on OCS activities up in Alaska. Is that consistent? We debated removal costs under OCS. This amendment puts a cap on removal costs in OCS in Alaska of $350 million. Treat Alaska one way and the rest of the country another way? That is what this amendment does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. METZENBAUM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM].

AMENDMENT NO. 691, AS MODIFIED

Mr. METZENBAUM. One point. The Senator from Louisiana is 100 percent on target. I send a modified amendment to the desk. I appreciate his pointing out that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the Senator's modifying his own amendment?

Action has not been taken on the amendment by virtue of the time limitation. The Chair hears no objection.

Has the Senator stated his modification? What is the modification?

Mr. METZENBAUM. The modification provision for the deletion of the last paragraph of the amendment, which does indeed deal with the very subject that Senator WILSON addressed yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator mean the last paragraph on page 1, designated (C)?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the time for the quorum not be charged?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I ask unanimous consent that the time not be charged to any of the parties.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I am prepared to vote, although we have not heard from manager.

Mr. BAUCUS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his modification, or if he prefers, the clerk will state the modification.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Metzenbaum amendment (No. 691) is modified by striking on line 14 the words "or offshore," and on line 16 beginning with "and," and strike "and the Outer Continental Shelf the Beaufort Sea and the Chukchi Sea."

The amendment (No. 691), as modified, is as follows:

SEC. . INCREASE IN LIABILITY FOR CERTAIN OILSPILLS, EXTENSION OF LIABILITY WITHOUT FAULT TO AREAS OF THE ARCTIC.—At the appropriate place in the liability provision of this bill, insert the following:

"The owner or operator of any facility, the holder of any lease, right-of-way or permit of oil exploration, development, or transportation shall be liable, under this Act, for all damages, and removal costs, sustained by any person, that arise out of or directly result from the discharge or substantial threat of discharge of oil from—

"(A) the Trans-Alaska Pipeline;

"(B) fields or reservoirs supplying oil to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline; and

"(C) onshore oil and gas exploration, development or transportation activities in areas on Alaska's North Slope, including State submerged lands.

"Notwithstanding section 204(a)(2) of the Trans-Alaska Oil Pipeline Act of 1973 (Public Law 93-153), liability under this Section shall be limited to $350,000,000 for any one incident. The unpaid portion of any claim that exceeds $350,000,000 may be asserted and adjudicated under other applicable Federal or State law. Liability for such damages shall be in accord with the ordinary rules of negligence.".

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment with the understanding—if the Senator from Ohio would please respond to my question—that the intent of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is to make it clear that the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System is included with and part of the liability provisions that we are enacting; that is, the Senator does not intend to set a separate system or separate standard of liability or separate limit of liability or treat the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System differently from other facilities and other provisions.

Mr. METZENBAUM. The Senator from Montana is correct.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am prepared to accept the amendment. I do believe the amendment is redundant, but it clarifies the point made by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, is there any time left to speak against the amendment?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Alaska.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. MURKOWSKI is recognized for 2 minutes.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the Chair, and I would like to speak as one who has gone through the realities associated with a number of incidents on the trans-Alaska pipeline, including the explosion of one of our pipeline pumping stations, a reality that we have had it dynamited, shot at, and so forth.

The justification for this legislation, Mr. President, is pretty hard to come by. There is basically no need for the amendment. This bill, as it stands before the Senate, has created a uniform liability scheme for the Nation. Now, the Senator from Ohio is selecting Alaska for different treatment.

Furthermore, when this thing is finally resolved, the status of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund as it exists now may be pulled. So I do not understand the purpose for the amendment, other than to penalize Alaska producers, because the Senator from Ohio is selecting them specifically as opposed to a piece of legislation we have before us that creates uniform liability.

I recognize this as a reaction as a consequence of a marine disaster, but I would point out to the Senator from Ohio that there is a difference here. We are talking about much less risk associated with moving oil by pipeline 800 miles, which we have done for some nearly 20 years, as opposed to the substantial risk there is, as proven by the number of instances of late, with the movement by maritime means.

So it is the contention of the Senator from Alaska there is little need for the amendment, and the implication of selecting Alaska from the rest of the Nation for the pipeline movement when we have pipelines all over the Nation is something that the Senator from Alaska just fails to feel is justified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. Metzenbaum is recognized.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I point out to the Senator from Alaska he just heard the managers of the bill indicate that they think there is no need for the amendment because the Alaska pipeline is already covered by the other provisions in this bill. So when the Senator from Alaska indicates that there is some effort to penalize Alaska, quite the opposite is the case.

I think the amendment's thrust is to protect the people of Alaska in the event there is an oilspill, in the event there is some problem which occurs by reason of the pipeline that is in Alaska.

I think the Senator from Alaska would certainly agree with me that there is a major difference in the pipeline in Alaska and any other pipelines located anywhere else throughout the country.

Be that as it may, the fact that there is a difference does not really affect this amendment because we are treating all pipelines the same according to the managers of the bill by the amendment that was previously adopted.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. MURKOWSKI. If I may respond to my friend, I ask for 30 seconds.

Mr. BAUCUS. I yield 30 seconds only to the Senator from Alaska.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. I thank the floor leader.

My answer to the Senator from Ohio is the very point that if there is no need, why do it? And our pipeline is a pipeline. It does the same thing other pipelines do. It happens to be in northern latitudes. It has been in existence and has been successful in spite of the dire predictions of those who claimed because it went through permafrost it would sink to China or the animals, the caribou and the moose would not cross it. It is a pipeline. It is well engineered and does its job. It should be treated the same as any other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time has expired.

The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, it has been brought to my attention there are a couple of ambiguities to say the least with respect to this amendment that I think have to be cleared up.

Essentially the last paragraph of this amendment states that unpaid claims may be asserted and adjudicated under other applicable Federal and State laws. It is the intention of the legislation before us with the compensation fund to kick in after this. This is not clear on this. It is something that has to be cleared.

Therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent that it not be charged against either side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the time consumed under the quorum call will not be charged against either side, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes as if in morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order.

Is there objection to the Senator's request that he be permitted to speak for 2 minutes without the 2 minutes being charged and that he be permitted to speak out of order and that the Senator be permitted to speak for the purpose of introducing a bill as in morning business?

There is no objection. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. PRESSLER. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. PRESSLER pertaining to the introduction of S. 1546 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask unanimous consent the time not be charged against either side.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will withhold that a minute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withhold?

Mr. BAUCUS. I withhold.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, my understanding is that staff has indicated they feel additional modification would be appropriate. I am prepared to send that modification to the desk.

Mr. BAUCUS. I am informed we are not yet ready to make that modification.

I renew my request.

Mr. CHAFEE addressed the Chair.

Mr. BAUCUS. I withhold my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration and speak not in excess of 2 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments are to be confined to those on the list.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Reserving the right to object, and I hope I will not have to, would the Senator from Rhode Island be good enough to explain what the amendment is.

Mr. CHAFEE. This is to clarify an amendment that the Senator from Wyoming sent to the desk and had approved last night regarding the acquisition of lands to offset the loss of natural resources, and as the Senator will recall they tried to straighten that out last night and it was not done in a technically correct fashion.

So with his approval I am sending forward an amendment to clear up that confusion that existed.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is not on the list.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be able to proceed despite the fact that it is not on the list.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to setting the pending amendment aside?

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, as I just came back on the floor, I am wondering what the amendment is.

Mr. CHAFEE. It straightens out the Wallop amendment of last night dealing with the money could not be used for acquisition of land that the Senator from Wyoming sought to clarify last night, but it was not done correctly, so he is asking me to submit a new amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is the Senator from Rhode Island proceeding at the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CHAFEE. I am.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection.

Mr. CHAFEE. I renew my request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair objects for the moment in his capacity as a Senator from the State of West Virginia.

Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, what is the pending business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending business is S. 686 and the pending question before the Senate is the amendment by Mr. Metzenbaum.

AMENDMENT NO. 691, AS FURTHER MODIFIED

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Ohio is going to send a modification of his amendment to the desk.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am prepared to do that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senator will send his modification to the desk.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the thrust of this amendment is to delete the next to the last sentence in the last paragraph of the amendment. It was pointed out by the managers of the bill that they feel that clarification is needed. The Senator from Ohio has no objection to making that modification. Therefore, I have sent the amendment to the desk being so modified.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I do not think I will object, I ask the Chair if we may have a copy of this amendment now as it will read if it is adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the entire amendment, as modified.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

"SEC. . INCREASE IN LIABILITY FOR CERTAIN OILSPILLS, EXTENSION OF LIABILITY WITHOUT FAULT TO AREAS OF THE ARCTIC.—The owner or operator of any facility, the holder of any lease, right-of-way or permit for oil exploration, development, or transportation shall be liable, under this Act, for all damages, and removal costs, sustained by any person, that arise out of or directly result from the discharge or substantial threat of discharge of oil from—

At the appropriate place in the liability provision of this bill, insert the following:

"(A) the Trans-Alaska Pipeline;

"(B) fields or reservoirs supplying oil to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline; and

"(C) onshore oil and gas exploration, development or transportation activities in areas on Alaska's North Slope, including State submerged lands.

"Notwithstanding section 204(a)(2) of the Trans-Alaska Oil Pipeline Act of 1973 (Public Law 93-153), liability under this section shall be limited to 352,000,000 for any one incident. Liability for such damages shall be in accord with the ordinary rules of negligence.".

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, is there any time left on this amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Mr. METZENBAUM has 1½ minutes remaining. There is some time remaining on the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I do not seek time on the bill because I know other Senators have asked for that time.

This has changed the scope of this amendment, though, and I would ask unanimous consent that I have 3 minutes to address this modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I would urge the Senator from Ohio to respond if he has time, and I hope that we can get time for him. It is still by understanding that this amendment does not, in any way, affect State law. It now includes State submerged lands, but it does not in any way affect the State of Alaska's law which provided for unlimited liability.

I am concerned about this clause that I have not seen before, which says: "Liability for such damages shall be in accord with the ordinary rules of negligence."

Again, I say to the Senate, suppose a terrorist comes to our State and blows up one of these facilities. The question is: Where does the money come from to remove the oil and the damage? Under existing law, the operator of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline would pay the first $50 million and the fund would pay the balance of the cost. Under this bill now, the operator of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline would pay $350 million and the fund would pay the balance of the cost.

But that is only under Federal law. Under State law, it could provide an unlimited liability basis under Alaskan State law.

Now, is there any intent here to change in any way the right of the State of Alaska to control, under normal negligence concepts, actions, to recover for the cost of removal or any other damage caused by such incident?

The real problem is you have to remember this is liability without fault. We are talking about the terrorist incident, we are talking about the bolt of lightning, we are talking about an earthquake, we are talking about some damage that comes not through any fault.

Now, suddenly, we are talking about "liability for such damages shall be in accord with the ordinary rules of negligence." That is not the case of this section. This section deals with strict liability, not with negligence.

I do not like that last sentence being in there. I do think it changes this concept. It also refers to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Act of 1973, which, under this bill, is repealed. So what is that doing in there?

Mr. President, I have to tell the Chair that I never saw the second page before. I was only given the first page. Had I seen the second page, I would have opposed the amendment to begin with. I do not believe we should invade the negligence area under State law in a section that deals only with strict liability and the strict liability threshold. If the Congress wants to set it at $350 million and charge the users of Alaska oil all over the country, if they want to get involved in a strict liability section and talk about putting limitations on liability on the Trans-Alaska Pipeline under the ordinary rules of negligence, I am compelled to object. If that stays in there, Mr. President, I will ask for a rollcall vote and oppose the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, is there any time remaining on the amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] has 1½ minutes remaining on the amendment. There is time remaining on the bill.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I want to say that this amendment that I just put in was put in at the suggestion of the managers of the bill. The Senator from Alaska raises a very valid point. I believe that we need to discuss it and have adequate time to discuss it. I, therefore, ask that the Senate go into a quorum call and that the time not be charged against any of the parties.

Mr. BREAUX. Will the Senate withhold that request? I would just like to have 1 minute for an observation on the amendment which may also be addressed during that quorum call.

Is there an opportunity for me to get a minute from someone?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have no right to do so, but I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, this amendment is taking longer than all of us thought, so I ask unanimous consent that each side be granted an additional 3 minutes on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield 1 minute to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I just want to draw attention to another concern that I have on line 12 of the amendment of the Senator. Perhaps staff could take a look at what I am suggesting.

On line 12 of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, it says that fields or reservoirs supplying oil to the trans-Alaska pipeline would be covered and would be subject to the $350 million limitation on liability.

My question would be: If that field or reservoir is in the Outer Continental Shelf, are we not now once again establishing a limitation of liability on OCS activity? I think that is what the language would do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

The time will run equally.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and I ask that the time not be charged to either side.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, before we go into that, may I ask the Senator that he withhold that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withhold the suggestion of an absence of a quorum?

Mr. BAUCUS. I withhold.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might take up an unlisted amendment and be granted 2 minutes on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

The Chair understands that this is a technical amendment and it is not one of the two technical amendments listed under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Is there objection?

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. DOMENICI. Is there a time limit on the pending amendment and, if so, how much time remains?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. METZENBAUM] has 3 minutes and 40 seconds, and the Senator from Montana has 2 minutes and 8 seconds.

Mr. DOMENICI. Parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. DOMENICI. Is there a remainder of the time prior to final disposition of this matter? Is there any open time that is not subject to a time limitation?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is some time remaining for debate on the bill. The Senator from Montana has 9 minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. Are there any other amendments with time limitations on them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon?

Mr. DOMENICI. Are there any other amendments that have been agreed to by unanimous consent that have time limitations on them?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no amendments remaining other than the pending amendment. One amendment by Mr. STEVENS remains and two committee technical amendments.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair.

I have no objection to the consent agreement that Senator CHAFEE propounded to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the pending amendment will be set aside temporarily. And the Senator will be recognized to propound his technical amendment.

AMENDMENT NO. 692

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator form Rhode Island [Mr. CHAFEE] proposes an amendment numbered 692.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

(1) Amend the third sentence of section 102(d)(1) to read a follows:

"Sums recovered by the United States Government as trustee under this subsection shall be retained by the trustee, without further appropriation, for use only to restore, replace, or acquire the equivalent of such natural resources, except that the use of such sums to acquire land or interests therein shall be subject to further appropriation and used as specifically provided in appropriation Acts.".

(2) Section 103(a)(6) is amended to read as follows:

"(6) the costs of Federal or State efforts to restore, rehabilitate, replace or acquire the equivalent of any natural resources injured, destroyed, or lost as a result of any discharge of oil, except that Federal efforts to acquire land or interests therein shall be subject to such amounts as are specifically provided in appropriation Acts;".

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, last evening we adopted an amendment by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WALLOP] regarding acquisition of land to offset loss of natural resources. We had an excellent discussion on that matter and reached an understanding as to the intent of his amendment and it was redrafted, but unfortunately did not come out to meet the objectives of the intent that was expressed.

This amendment that I have sent to the desk will make technical and conforming changes to the affected portions of this bill and has been cleared by the Senator from Wyoming and the managers of the bill.

This amendment makes it clear that the previous amendment only affected the authority to acquire land and interest therein. It was not intended to affect the authority to acquire other natural resources.

So, Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair removed his objection which he interposed in his capacity as a Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHAFEE. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further debate, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment (No. 692) was agreed to.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

MR. BAUCUS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment by Mr. METZENBAUM.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio is very diligent in pointing out to the Senate the need to be sure that the trans-Alaska pipeline system and the Liability Act are fully covered for purposes of legislation before us.

It is clear to this Senator and I think also to the Senator from Rhode Island that, with the amendments we have now passed to this bill, and with the liability limits raised, the matter intended to be covered by the Senator from Ohio is already covered.

As I stated earlier today, it is my opinion that the Senator's pending amendment is redundant, that the matters are already covered, that section 311 of the Clean Water Act combined with various provisions of the bill make it clear that the liability limits that pertain to the country generally, vessels and offshore facilities, et cetera, also pertain in equal weight to the State of Alaska and to the trans-Alaska pipeline system. That was my understanding then. It is very much my belief now.

With that understanding, Mr. President, I am wondering if the Senator from Ohio would be so kind as to withdraw his amendment because he is adding something that is redundant. Almost by definition it is creating some ambiguities and some complexities that need not be created.

Because the matter is already covered, I was wondering if he could possibly withdraw his amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time, the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I want to echo that thought. On this amendment, on which I think there was a 20-minute time limit equally divided, we must have spent certainly 50 minutes or an hour.

In the opinion of both the managers it is redundant anyway. I do not know why we are dealing with the amendment. I know the Senator was anxious to reinforce his views that the Alaska pipeline was covered. The view is that it is covered. As an onshore facility.

So I hope the Senator would withdraw his amendment as modified twice, I believe, so we can get on with this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, the managers have been extremely cooperative in connection with the previous amendment. It is their representation that the matter is presently covered. Senators from Alaska have been somewhat concerned that in some way either we were picking on the Alaska pipeline or that we may be changing the whole question of preemption of State law, which nobody had any intention of doing. Certainly I did not.

Under those circumstances, in order to permit the Senate to proceed with the balance of its business, and with the assurances from both managers that the subject is already covered, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment as modified is withdrawn.

The Senator from Alaska.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to publicly thank the Senator from Ohio. I think we sometimes see ghosts and we see shadows. Courts find them, too. I appreciate his courtesy because I think it is covered by the prior amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alaska is recognized.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I would join Senator STEVENS in thanking the Senator from Ohio for his response and withdrawal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time? What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, we are practically finished. The fact is, we have one minor matter that has to be cleared up. It is a jurisdictional matter with the Finance Committee and the matter has to be worked out with the senior Senator from Idaho. It is my expectation we will have worked out very quickly. After that is completed, we will go to final passage.

Mr. President, therefore, I suggest the absence of a quorum, and I ask the time not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the time of the quorum call will not be charged and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I wonder if the manager of the bill will yield me 1 minute for my last comment on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is recognized for 1 minute.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, my mind goes back to 1973 when the distinguished Senator from Washington, Senator Scoop Jackson, and I tried to work out a lot of the problems concerning what the risks would be associated with the transportation of the oil from Alaska.

We ship about half the oil we produce in the country, and half of that oil comes from my State transported by water. I think that this bill changes the direction now and enters on to the national scene, which where some of the hopes that Scoop Jackson had at the time when we worked on that bill.

It is an activist fund, that is the point I want to make. That fund has sat for 16 years. It never paid out a dime, and it earned a lot of interest but it was not involved. This fund will be involved. The fund will finance science; it will finance research: it will finance response teams; it will challenge the country to be prepared. I am proud to be here today to be able to do that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time? The Senator from Montana.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield myself 3 minutes.

Mr. President, we are about to pass, and I do not make this statement likely, an historic piece of legislation. This is very significant. It is a bill which will very significantly, very dramatically place strict responsibilities on oil companies, transportation companies, in order to help prevent the reoccurrence of catastrophies like the Exxon Valdez and also to be more sure that there is much better response to cleanup than has been the case in the past.

Mr. President, I also want at this point to praise our majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, who has worked for so many years to work for the passage of this legislation. He has mentioned to me many times he has been working 8 years to get oilspill liability legislation passed.

It is probably true the Exxon Valdez incident helped crystallize American public opinion to make that happen. We are not thankful at all for Exxon Valdez. It is unfortunate in life that sometimes it takes a catastrophe such as this to help mobilize, help crystallize public opinion into action and, therefore, encourage the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives into action.

This is not just a coastal waterway problem, Mr. President. Oilspills occur inland as well as coastal waterways. Just on Monday of this week in probably one of the most beautiful lakes in our country, White Fish Lake, in northwestern Montana, we had an oilspill. Tanker cars on the Burlington Northern Railroad skipped the track, jumped the track and fell into White Fish Lake. Two 25,000 gallon diesel fuel cars plunged into the lake. Access is extremely difficult. High winds have made it difficult to clean up. Close to the shore, a thick mustard colored slick covers White Fish Lake, MT.

It is a personal tragedy to me, Mr. President, because one of my very earliest childhood memories as a 4-year-old boy is going to White Fish Lake during our 2-week August vacations our family took. We would take a long drive to White Fish Lake. It took almost all day in those days. We spent 2 weeks there. Stayed at a little cabin on the lake. It was the highlight of my life as a little kid to go to White Fish Lake. Now White Fish Lake is the subject of an oilspill. There is a slick covering White Fish Lake.

I must say, Mr. President, this legislation would help also prevent White Fish Lake catastrophes from occurring because it will place additional responsibility, preparation and response responsibility also on the Burlington Northern Railroad. I say to my colleagues in the Senate that this is a piece of legislation, and it is a very much needed piece of legislation. I commend the Senate for passing this legislation, as it is about to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Three minutes has expired.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 3 minutes and 40 seconds.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New Mexico on the bill.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I would like to make two points. One has to do with this bill, and one has to do with a matter I believe should be on the floor now right alongside of this bill.

First let me say for those who remember the disaster that occurred at the Sioux City, IA, airport and who listened to the medical doctor who led the emergency preparedness team for that community that we should have learned something from that accident. We should know that to have preparedness plans without actually carrying them out on a trial basis in a regular manner is calculated to cause preparedness plans to be nothing more than plans. In Sioux City, they had trial runs because they were aware there could be an accident. And, because they did the trial runs over and over, they were ready when an accident did occur. I am pleased that this legislation will force the oilspill emergency response teams to conduct practice drills. It requires a lot of patience to prepare for accidents when they do not occur. It is like the military doing their training in peacetime expecting a war. It is boring; it requires some real top down encouragement and some real discipline. I hope this commitment, encouragement, and discipline begins at the top with our oilspill response teams.

Mr. President, on my second point, while oilspills and the consequences are of grave importance to the American people, the Senator from New Mexico is concerned that we are not talking about ways to reduce our dependence on foreign oil. Quite to the contrary, it seems that our dependence on foreign oil is not an important issue to many people in our country. I can predict for the Senate, we can pass this oilspill legislation and then if it is not good enough, pass some more, but you are going to have more oilspills, not less, in the next decade from tankers because America has to import 40 percent of her oil, and that figure is growing dramatically.

That means thousands and thousands of tankers will have to come to American shores to feed our petroleum needs. And, accidents are a function, regardless of what people say, of the number of times and number of movements by tankers.

Mr. President, our dependence now is 40 percent and growing. We ought to be on the floor discussing a real way to minimize spills, and that is to increase America's energy independence. That is how you will minimize oilspills. We ought to be talking real policy on Outer Continental Shelf drilling. We ought to be talking real policy about increasing our domestic production. There are at least three or four ways for us to do this. Yet, the emergency occurs and we limit ourselves to addressing the immediate problem. The attrition which is occurring to the American economy because $40 billion a year in our trade imbalance is from petroleum products is put somewhere in the back of the room. We are leaving 70 percent of America's oil in the ground when we drill oil wells because we have to have new techniques to get it all out of the ground. Yet, no one is seriously discussing on the floor of the Senate small incentives that might permit us to bring that oil to the surface. For every additional 100 million barrels that we could bring up from American oil reserves, we could eliminate 1 or 10 or more tankers. To the extent that we do not develop our reserves, we add 1 or 2 or 10 or 20 or 50 or more tankers per year, to our waters, and we increase the number of accidents. Certainly we hope we will minimize the damage of the accidents that are going to occur, but accidents will occur.

But, I think it is really time for us to say, how do we minimize the tanker movements rather than just take care of the accidents which are going to occur? We have to have a policy on offshore drilling, Mr. President. We cannot run around saying it is there available to us and do nothing about it.

Mr. President, I support the prevention and cleanup provisions of the legislation now pending before the Senate. The bill would deal in a comprehensive manner with the question of how to prevent oilspills and, in the event that they do occur, how to clean them up quickly and efficiently in order to minimize their economic and environmental damage.

The recent oilspills in Prince William Sound, the Delaware River, the Houston ship channel, and off the coast of Rhode Island demonstrate the urgent need for oilspill preparedness.

Regarding the spill in Prince William Sound, Exxon has made a very serious mistake that could have been avoided. They must be held completely responsible for their actions and, specifically, for their poor response in the cleanup process.

I am pleased that the legislation that the Senate is now considering would address the oilspill issue in a comprehensive manner, and not just addressing it port by port, or region by region. As we have seen from recent events, oilspills can occur anywhere and at anytime—with those occurring in coastal waters being particularly disastrous.

I am also very pleased that the pending legislation would establish a comprehensive and coordinated emergency planning system to prepare for oilspills. An important, and I believe essential, ingredient in emergency preparedness is practice. This bill requires that the emergency response teams conduct training and periodic drills without prior notice, at least two per year.

Mr. President, this legislation will help ensure that in the future our coastlines and wildlife will not be subjected to the degradation that we saw earlier this year.

Mr. President, I think we urgently need to enact the oilspill prevention and cleanup provisions of the legislation now before the Senate. I hope that in the near future we will take additional steps that will allow us to produce more oil from our domestic reserves in an environmentally sound manner.

I thank the Chair and yield the floor.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has 3 minutes and 20 seconds.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield the remainder of the time to the majority leader.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority leader is recognized.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I commend the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator BAUCUS, and the ranking member, Senator CHAFEE, for their effort, patience, and leadership on this important issue. I commend, as well, Senator STEVENS who has a specific, a very deep concern on this issue, and Senator BREAUX, who has been extremely helpful in working on this legislation.

Mr. President, this is a gratifying day for me personally, having been involved in attempting to gain enactment of such legislation for 8 years. It is my hope as well an important day for the Nation, one which on enactment of this legislation into law will deter oilspills in the future, thereby reducing the potential of damage to our Nation's resources, and when in the unfortunate instance as will inevitably occur spills do happen, they will be cleaned up and contained much more readily than would otherwise have been the case.

We hope very much that the House will act soon on companion legislation. There remain deep differences as to the best approach, but if we come to the conference in good faith and with open hearts and minds, prepared to subordinate individual preference to the national interest, then I believe that this measure will become law soon and the Nation will be the better for it.

I thank all my colleagues for their participation in this effort. I look forward to working with them to make this into a law.

This has been a most unusual circumstance and one in which we have had occasionally trying times and sharp words, but overall I think we can be pleased with the result and I look forward to bringing this to completion in the near future.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana has 47 seconds.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I think we have no further business, no further amendments.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, we are waiting for a colloquy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee has authority under the order to use one additional amendment. Does the committee wish to execute that authority?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I thank the Chair for that observation. The committee does not wish to execute that authority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thanks the Senator.

OILSPILL PROTOCOLS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, one of the issues we have not debated during consideration of this legislation has been the value of the oilspill protocols.

Those protocols are currently pending before the Foreign Relations Committee. The House has included language in its bill to implement the protocols. I am reminded by the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee that only the Senate can ratify the protocols. Thus the question of the protocols is not a matter to be debated during the conference on S. 686.

I ask unanimous consent that a letter from Senator PELL on this issue be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Washington, DC, August 3, 1989.

Hon. GEORGE J. MITCHELL,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. LEADER: I am writing to you with respect to S. 686, the Oil Pollution Liability and Compensation Act of 1989.

As you know, various House counterpart bills attempt to incorporate by reference the 1984 Protocols Amending the Civil Liability and Fund Conventions. I urge you to instruct the Senate conferees on S. 686 not to adopt any provision which would undermine the constitutional role and responsibility of the Senate.

I would appreciate your assistance on this matter.

With every good wish.

Ever sincerely,

CLAIBORNE PELL,
Chairman.

Mr. BAUCUS. I understand that the Internal Revenue Code contains a tax that is to be collected when authorizing legislation that qualifies as comprehensive oilspill legislation is enacted. This legislation was developed in contemplation that the proceeds of that tax would be available to fund the oilspill liability and compensation fund.

Mr. BENTSEN. I support this legislation, and I agree that the spending programs it contains should be adequately funded. When the Finance Committee considers the reconciliation bill after the August recess, I will recommend that the committee propose an amendment to section 4611(f)(2)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code to specify that the pending legislation qualifies as comprehensive oilspill legislation under that section.

Mr. BAUCUS. I thank the chairman of the Finance Committee.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, if I may, let me add a few additional thoughts to those made by my friend from Montana. The reason it is so important for this legislation to qualify as comprehensive oilspill legislation under 4611(f)(2)(B) of the Internal Revenue Code is twofold: First, it raises additional funds for use under this bill. Second, it assures that all oil delivered to this country, both foreign and domestic, be treated equally with respect to funds being collected for oilspill liability and compensation purposes. Without this tax already in the law but not triggered by this legislation, our domestic companies carry a disproportionate share of this liability burden, even though foreign oil tanker traffic remains a considerable portion of this country's total oil tanker traffic. I thank the Senator from Montana for his concern and I appreciate the commitment of my friend from Texas, the chairman of the Finance Committee, to recommend that his committee add such qualifying legislation on the reconciliation bill this fall.

OIL POLLUTION LIABILITY AND COMPENSATION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the proposed legislation suggests seven potential regional centers capable of responding to catastrophic oilspills and operated by the Coast Guard. The industry is currently setting up a very similar network through its newly formed Petroleum Industry Response Organization [PIRO]. Will there be duplication, or is it intended that the Federal role will be to complement the initiative of the private sector?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is my hope that this legislation will generate appropriate coordination of Federal, State, local and industry resources to prevent and clean up future oilspills.

Preventing pollution and minimizing damage from future catastrophic oilspills is best achieved with the maximum cooperation and effort provided by Government agencies, a full commitment from the petroleum industry, shippers of petroleum products, concerned citizens groups, and indeed, from the world of science and technology.

The legislation requires industry to be able to remove oil and minimize damage to the environment without the active participation of the Federal Government. Industry initiatives, as set forth in the recent API Oilspill Task Force Report, which calls for the formation of an industry response organization with regional response centers and supporting staging areas, could provide much of this required capability.

The sections of the legislation requiring the President to expand the National Contingency Plan and establish regional response teams are intended to ensure that the Federal Government has sufficient capability to promptly and properly remove spills and minimize damage to the environment in cases where industry and other efforts are not adequate to provide prompt and proper response. The legislation envisions cooperative efforts between the oil industry and the Government in such cases.

I am encouraged by the progress that the oil industry has made toward providing oilspill removal capability, and I am hopeful that the entire oil industry participates in this organization.

Successful implementation by industry of the goals set forth in the API Task Force Report would be a significant step toward meeting the requirements of this legislation and would, therefore, contribute to providing the Nation with the safeguards needed to prevent and better handle damage caused by oilspills.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished majority leader, both for his response and for his long and difficult work on this legislation. We don't want to be in a position where we are creating a separate, Federal response team if the response team established by the industry is determined to be sufficient.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I am pleased to rise in support of this important and timely legislation which established a comprehensive and unified plan for the cleanup of oilspills affecting our Nation.

Under existing Federal law, at least five statutes deal with the issue of oilspill liability and compensation. Each of these statutes is different and each provides for varying and uneven liability standards, as well as differences on the scope of coverage for cleanup costs and damages. The legislation being considered today addresses a variety of the complications associated with these different provisions by establishing a single oilspill compensation fund, improving preparedness and response to oilspills, setting liability caps on tankers and barges, and by expanding requirements of the national contingency plan for the cleanup of oilspills.

First, Mr. President, this legislation establishes a single oilspill compensation fund that would provide up to $1 billion per spill for cleanup costs and damages. A fee of 1.3 cents on each barrel of oil delivered to U.S. ports would finance the fund. This fee was provided for in the 1986 budget reconciliation bill, and would be triggered upon enactment of oilspill legislation.

Pursuant to the bill before us today, the fund will provide a source of money for immediate cleanup activities or damage compensation in the event those responsible do not act promptly. The fund would be used for oil removal costs and would be available for prompt damage compensation. After money is paid out, the fund would then be subrogated to all rights against the party responsible. The responsible party would, however, be able to assert any defenses that may apply and claim any limitations on liability that may apply.

Second, this bill raises liability limits for both oil removal costs and compensation for damages. For tankers, the limit would increase to $500 per gross ton or $10 million, whichever is greater. For any other vessel, the limit would increase to $300 per gross ton or $500,000, whichever is greater.

Third, it should be noted that this legislation does not preempt State laws and programs. States may continue their own well-established State oilspill program if they have them.

Fourth, the Federal Government would have control of cleanup under this bill—in my opinion, a proper role for the Federal Government. Under this legislation, the President would be required to conduct cleanup or arrange for cleanup, unless the cleanup is being conducted properly and promptly by the responsible party. I am pleased that the present administration has already demonstrated its commitment to Federal involvement through the Exxon Valdez cleanup efforts.

Fifth, this legislation expands the requirements of the national contingency plan for oil cleanup. It requires the President to establish regional oilspill response teams, and also requires owners and operators of oil-carrying vessels and facilities to submit contingency plans for the prevention, containment, and cleanup of oilspills.

Mr. President, I have historically looked upon the granting of additional power and authority to the Federal Government with close scrutiny. I have also done so with this bill. However, I believe the additional authority encompassed in this bill is appropriate, given the nature of oil spill issues.

Last, this bill includes the substance of S. 1461, which will enhance oil tanker safety. This language includes two important safety provisions aimed at the persons involved in the operation of vessels on the waterways of our Nation. Specifically, the first provision, which is similar to a bill that I cosponsored this Congress, allows the Coast Guard access to the National Driver Registry in order to identify people with drunk driving violations, so that their merchant marine licenses can be denied, suspended or revoked. The second provision requires random alcohol testing for all merchant marine personnel in safety sensitive positions. Just as we have taken steps to control alcohol use on our highways and in our airways, we must take the necessary steps to protect our waterways from persons under the influence of alcohol. These provisions should help achieve that objective.

I am pleased to offer my support for this legislation.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to commend the Committee on Environment and Public Works, as well as the Commerce and Energy Committee for their work in bringing the Oil Pollution Liability and Compensation Act of 1989 to the floor.

Fortunately, the tragic consequences for not passing this type of legislation in 1984 when President Reagan first asked us too was not realized. Like so many other issues, the Senate has been playing Russian roulette with this bill. This time we were lucky—the loaded cylinder never made it to the chamber.

PROVISIONS

Mr. President, the bill would finally establish a single fund and combine it with a single strategy for attacking oil spilled from tankers, barges, and OCS facilities.

In addition it would increase the amount of liability for the owners of vessels, facilities, and royalties.

Further, it requires a national contingency plan—in advance—to ensure a quicker and more effective first strike and follow through in future spills.

OILSPILL RESPONSE TEAMS

One concern I have with the legislation is a requirement for regional oilspill response teams. Right now, the industry is in the process of creating the Petroleum Industry Response Organization [PIRO] consisting of five regional response teams. The language contained in S. 686 appears to allow the private sector to continue with this effort. It is my hope that, once these teams are in place, the apparent requirement for additional, Federal personnel will not be required for operational positions. There will certainly be a need for Federal supervisory personnel, but the idea of competing response teams rushing to a spill leaves me with the feeling that the work would be inefficient and insufficient, since the teams might never get coordinated. If the spirit of this bill is to bring a single response in funding, liability, and planning, it should continue through the response teams.

LIABILITY

Mr. President, much has been said on the issue of liability. We have heard that this legislation will release guilty parties from paying for their wrongs. This is simply not true. Liability limits are in existence today. This bill increases those limits, which will force those guilty of oilspills to pay more than they can be forced to pay today.

MAKE INDUSTRY PAY

Probably the most important part of this bill is that we will ensure that industry pays for oilspills. It is almost inconceivable to me that we have, by failing to act in previous years, been putting the taxpayer at risk, not industry. Under existing law, section 311 funds can be used to clean up the spills. The problem is that the section 311 fund is now funded through appropriate money—taxpayer dollars. The bill will finally implement a funding scheme which has been automatically available to us since 1986. No longer should we hold the taxpayers hostage to political agendas of the Congress.

ACQUIRING EQUIVALENT RESOURCES

Finally, Mr. President, the provision allowing trustees of the fund to act on behalf of the public to acquire equivalent resources when damages from spills cannot be corrected is of serious concern to me. I do not question the need to acquire and protect environmentally sensitive areas when it can be afforded. But the process should include a review by Congress. I am concerned that the system currently in the bill strips the Congress of it's constitutional authority to appropriate funds for this and every other purpose. I would urge that Senate conferees on this measure take a second look at this provision to continue some oversight by the Congress in land and resource acquisition.

SUMMARY

While I do have several concerns with this measure, the legislation is long overdue. I will support the bill, but hope that improvements are made in conference with the House.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, on page 55 of S. 686, under section 204 operators of all tank vessels which carry oil in bulk as cargo in or upon the navigable waters of the United States are required to prepare a contingency plan to respond to oilspills.

Oftentimes, vessels lighten their cargo within the exclusive economic zone to smaller vessels. These tankers are as susceptible to discharges of oil as other tankers.

QUESTION. Is it your opinion this contingency planning requirement applies to vessels that lighten the oil to smaller vessels in the executive economic zone?

Mr. BAUCUS. Yes, those vessels that lighten oil in the exclusive economic zone are subject to the contingency planning just as they are subject to financial responsibility requirements under 104(a)(1).

Mr. BREAUX. Thank you for clarifying that point.

APPLICATION OF STATES' LIABILITY LAWS

Mr. GRAHAM. Senator BAUCUS, is it your understanding that the intent of this bill is to allow the States with greater liability requirements than those covered by Federal law, to further assess costs for damages in State waters resulting from a spill in Federal waters?

Mr. BAUCUS. Yes, Senator. In recognizing that States have different requirements, the intent of the bill is that the States not—and I emphasize not—be preempted relative to their liability requirements, when State resources are adversely affected by an oilspill.

Mr. GRAHAM. Does this mean then, Senator, that if by example, a spill occurs 20 miles offshore and drifts within State boundaries, causing damages to State resources, that the State could then seek to recover additional costs for damages to those State resources?

Mr. BAUCUS. That is correct, Senator.

Mr. GRAHAM. Senator CHAFEE, is this also your understanding?

Mr. CHAFEE. Yes; it is.

Mr. GRAHAM. I thank my good friends from Montana and Rhode Island, respectively. Thank you, Mr. President.

Mr. LIEBERMAN. I congratulate the managers of this bill, Senators BAUCUS and CHAFEE, members of the Environment and Public Works and other committees, for their outstanding work in ensuring that this bill passed the Senate in an extremely rapid timeframe. Most of all, I congratulate the majority leader who has worked tirelessly for the last 8 years to enact oilspill legislation. Without his leadership and inspiration, today's bill would not have been possible.

I am especially pleased that the bill contains strong liability, penalties and enforcement provisions and closes the loopholes which now exist in the law. The Exxon disaster left us not with one mess to clean up but two—the one in the water and the one in the books, in the laws and contingency plans that failed us and that may prevent us from adequately protecting Alaska's environment and exacting the kind of justice the American public demands. This law goes a long way toward cleaning up the mess in our books.

After the Exxon spill, I compared the liability provisions of the Clean Water Act for oilspills with the very strong provisions of the Superfund law concerning the disposal of hazardous substances on land and found some very important differences. I introduced legislation (S. 1223) to establish the same strong scheme of liability for the cleanup of oil dumped into the water as the Superfund law provides for the cleanup of hazardous substances on land and I am pleased that S. 686 adopts many of these provisions.

Importantly, S. 686 provides clear authority to the Government to order the polluter to clean up a spill. If the polluter fails to comply with the order, the Government can collect triple the costs of cleanup. Under these provisions, I believe a company like Exxon will think carefully in the future before it threatens to leave the scene of a spill if the Government is not satisfied that a cleanup has been completed. The decision about whether further cleanup is necessary will no longer be in the hands of the spiller.

I am also pleased with the tough civil and criminal penalty provisions of S. 686. In examining the old law, I became extremely concerned with the ambiguous penalty provisions which under one plausible interpretation, could have let Exxon off the hook for $5,000. My legislation raised civil penalties to an amount up to $25,000 per day of violation or $1,000 per barrel of oil discharged, whichever is greater. It also provided for a range of criminal penalties, including in certain circumstances, imprisonment of up to 15 years. S. 686 adopted these provisions.

The American people have been frustrated and angry throughout this Exxon disaster. They don't like it when they hear that our laws do not compel companies to prepare for environmental disaster or to clean up after it happens. In this legislation, the Senate has effectively addressed the concerns of the American people.

EQUIVALENT RESOURCES

Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I proposed an amendment to the S. 686, the oilspill legislation. Among other provisions, that bill allows the Federal Government to acquire resources equivalent to those damaged by an oilspill.

My amendment limits acquisition of equivalent resources to acquisition of lands or interests therein for which appropriations have been provided in advance.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I would like to clarify a point. In the West, a generic reference to land or property may include not only land specifically, but the property interest of water. When the Senator states "land or interests therein," does he include water rights?

Mr. WALLOP. Yes. Under the Western appropriative rights system of water law, a water right is a property right. Equivalent resources include not only land, but water. The Federal Government acknowledges the property right in water ownership. In the West, like any other water rights holder, the Federal Government files within a Western States's water court to establish the Federal Government's specific ownership in water where needed.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. In addition, the Federal Government purchases water rights. I can give an example. For a cooperative project by the Federal Government with the States of Wyoming, Utah, and Colorado, Congress appropriated funds for water purchases to protect endangered species of fish in the Colorado River. Those water rights within Colorado are then administered by the Colorado Water Conservation Board.

An understanding of the property rights in the West is vital to understanding the interests protected by Mr. WALLOP's amendment.

Mr. WALLOP. I thank the Senator for helping me make this point. My amendment limits acquisition of any property—land and water—until appropriations have been approved by Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Who yields time?

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I think I still have 5 minutes, do I not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator still has 5 minutes.

The Senator's time will run.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum and have it charged against my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not sufficient time remaining for a quorum call.

Mr. CHAFEE. I think I have some time do I not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has less than 5 minutes.

Mr. CHAFEE. Is that enough for a quorum call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may not be. The Senator may ask unanimous consent that the time not be charged.

Mr. CHAFEE. I ask that the time not be charged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or the Senator may yield back his time.

Without objection, the time will not be charged. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHAFEE. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All time has expired or been yielded back under the order.

The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the order, the vote will now occur on S. 686.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? Will the clerk please repeat the responses.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. SIMPSON. I announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER] is necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DURENBERGER] would vote "Yea."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are there any other Senators in the Chamber who desire to vote?

The result was announced—yeas 99, nays 0, as follows:

SEC. 3. FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) oil spills in coastal and inland waters that are not contained and removed promptly and completely can cause serious environmental damage, including contamination of water, fouling of shorelines, and injury to fish, shellfish, and wildlife;

(2) oil spills in coastal and inland waters that are not contained and removed promptly and completely can cause significant economic impacts including damage to commercial and recreational fisheries, loss of recreational opportunities, and declines in tourism and related activities;

(3) oil spills occur on a regular basis in United States coastal and inland waters, with over ten thousand oil spills reported each year between 1973 and 1985;

(4) in March of this year, the largest oil spill in United States history occurred when the tanker Exxon Valdez ran aground in Prince William Sound, Alaska, spilling eleven million gallons of crude oil to the surrounding waters;

(5) the Exxon Valdez spill caused widespread and significant adverse impacts to the marine environment, to fish, birds, marine mammals, and other wildlife, to the commercial fishery of Southcentral Alaska and to Native villages and subsistence users, and the cleanup of the spill will cost millions of dollars;

(6) in the several months since the wreck of the Exxon Valdez, three additional major oil spills occurred within a twenty-four hour period in waters off Rhode Island, in the Delaware River, and in the Houston Ship Channel;

(7) there is a need to establish an adequate system of liability and compensation to assure prompt and complete cleanup of spilled oil and to compensate those damaged by such pollution;

(8) it is essential that State oil pollution liability and compensation statutes not be preempted in any manner by Federal law or international protocols;

(9) there is a need to provide clear direction to the President to ensure prompt and proper response to oil spills unless the President specifically determines that a private party is providing such a response;

(10) there is a need to establish minimum Federal standards and requirements for Federal approval in contingency planning to assure the prompt and effective response to oil spills from facilities and vessels;

(11) there is a need to establish an adequate and effective system of response centers storing necessary vessels, equipment, and supplies and housing necessary personnel to assure the prompt and effective response to oil spills from facilities and vessels;

(12) there is a need to provide for full and sustained involvement of local citizens and interested groups including fishing, business, and environmental interests, in the development of oil spill contingency plans and the oversight of operations at major oil facilities and terminals;

(13) there is a need to establish a clear and sufficient structure of penalties to effectively deter those who would discharge oil to the waters of the United States or to punish those who cause such discharges;

(14) there is a need to establish an adequate program of research to develop technologies and practices to clean up oil spills, to understand the environmental impacts of such spills, or to develop the necessary baseline information on the marine environment to understand the long-term effects of such spills; and

(15) it is essential that measures to address the problems associated with prevention, response, cleanup, and compensation relating to oil spills be enacted into law at the earliest possible date.

LIABILITY

SEC. 102. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision or rule of law, and subject only to the defenses set forth in subsection (b) of this section, the owner or operator of a vessel or an onshore or offshore facility from which oil is discharged, or which posed the threat of a discharge which causes the incurrence of removal costs, shall be liable for—

(1)(A) all removal costs incurred by the United States Government or a State under subsection (c), (d), (e), (f)(4), or (l) of section 311 of the Clean Water Act or under the Intervention on the High Seas or section 18 of the Deepwater Port Act of 1974; and

(B) any removal costs incurred by any person, including, but not limited to, any State; and

(2) all damages for economic loss or loss of natural resources resulting from such a discharge, including—

(A) any injury to, destruction of, or loss of any real or personal property;

(B) any loss of use of real or personal property;

(C) any injury to, destruction, mitigation, or loss of natural resources, including the reasonable costs of assessing such injury, destruction, or loss;

(D) any loss of use, including loss of subsistence use, of any natural resources, without regard to the ownership or management of such resources;

(E) any loss of income or profits or impairment of earning capacity resulting from injury to or destruction of real or personal property or natural resources, without regard to the ownership of such property or resources; and

(F) any direct or indirect loss of tax, royalty, rental, or net profits share revenue by the Federal Government or any State or political subdivision thereof, for a period of not to exceed one year.

(b)(1) There shall be no liability under subsection (a) of this section for a person otherwise liable who can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the discharge or threat of discharge of oil and the damages resulting therefrom were caused solely by—

(A) an act of God;

(B) an act of war;

(C) an act or omission of a third party other than an employee or agent of the defendant, or than one whose act or omission occurs in connection with a contractual relationship, existing directly or indirectly, with the defendant (except where the sole contractual arrangement arises from a published tariff and acceptance for carriage by a common carrier by rail), if the defendant establishes by a preponderance of the evidence that (i) the defendant exercised due care with respect to the oil concerned, taking into consideration the characteristics of such oil, in light of all relevant facts and circumstances, and (ii) the defendant took precautions against foreseeable acts or omissions of any such third party and the consequences that could foreseeably result from such acts or omissions; or

(D) any combination of the foregoing paragraphs.

(2) In any case where the owner or operator of a vessel or an onshore or offshore facility can establish by a preponderance of the evidence that a discharge and the damages resulting therefrom were caused solely by an act or omission of a third party in accordance with paragraph (1)(C) (or solely by such an act or omission in combination with an act of God or an act of war), such third party shall be liable under this section as if such third party were the owner or operator of a vessel or onshore or offshore facility from which the discharge actually occurred. Where the owner or operator of a tanker or an onshore or offshore facility which handles or stores oil in bulk or commercial quantities, from which oil is discharged, alleges that such discharge was caused solely by an act or omission of a third party, such owner or operator shall promptly pay to the United States Government, and any other claimant, the costs of removal or damages claimed and shall be entitled by subrogation to all rights of the United States Government or other claimant to recover such costs of removal or damages from such third party under this sub-section.

(c)(1) The liability of an owner or operator of a vessel or an onshore or offshore facility for damages and removal costs under this section for each discharge or incident shall not exceed—

(A) $1,000 per gross ton or $10,000,000, whichever is greater, of any tanker carrying oil in bulk or in commercial quantities as cargo, including any such barge operating in the navigable waters;

(B) $600 per gross ton or $500,000, whichever is greater, of any other vessel;

(C) the total of all removal costs under subsection (a)(1) of this section plus $75,000,000 for any Outer Continental Shelf facility;

(D) $350,000,000 for any deepwater port facility (including the liability of the licensee for a discharge from any vessel moored at such port, in any case where $350,000,000 exceeds $1,000 per gross ton of such vessel); or

(E) $350,000,000 for any other onshore or offshore facility.

The liability of an owner or operator under this section for interest (including prejudgment interest) shall not be subject to the limitations of this paragraph.

(2) Notwithstanding the limitations of paragraph (1) of this subsection, the liability of the owner or operator of a vessel or an onshore or offshore facility under subsection (a) of this section shall be the full and total damages and removal costs not offset by any removal costs incurred on behalf of such owner or operator, if (A) the discharge of oil was the result of willful misconduct or gross negligence or of a violation of applicable safety, construction, or operating standards or regulations; or (B) the owner or operator fails or refuses to report the discharge where required by law or to provide all reasonable cooperation and assistance requested by a responsible official in connection with removal activities or to provide removal action upon order of a responsible official. For the purpose of this paragraph, applicable standards or regulations with respect to a vessel shall be those adopted or promulgated by a Federal agency.

(3) Notwithstanding the limitations of paragraph (1) of this subsection or the defenses of subsection (b) of this section, all removal costs incurred by the United States Government or any State or local official or agency in connection with a discharge of oil from any Outer Continental Shelf facility or a vessel carrying oil as cargo from such a facility shall be borne by the owner or operator of such facility or vessel.

(4)(A) The President is authorized to establish by regulation, with respect to any class or category of onshore or offshore facility subject to paragraph (1) (D) or (E) of this subsection, a maximum limit of liability under this section of less than $350,000,000, but not less than $8,000,000, taking into account the size, storage capacity, oil throughput, proximity to sensitive areas, type of oil handled, history of discharges, and other factors relevant to risks posed by the class or category of facility.

(B) The President shall, by regulation, not less often than every three years, adjust the limits of liability specified in paragraph (1) of this subsection to reflect significant increases in the Consumer Price Index.

(5) If any person who is liable for a discharge or threat of discharge of oil from a vessel or onshore or offshore facility fails without sufficient cause to properly provide removal action upon order of the President pursuant to section 311 of the Federal Water Pollution Control Act, such person may be liable to the United States for punitive damages in an amount at least equal to three times the amount of any costs incurred by the Fund as a result of such failure to take proper action. The President is authorized to commence a civil action against any such person to recover the punitive damages. Any moneys received by the United States pursuant to this subsection shall be deposited in the Fund.

(6)(A) Any person who receives and complies with the terms of any order issued under paragraph (1) may, within 60 days after completion of the required action, petition the President for reimbursement from the Fund established under this section for the reasonable costs of such action, plus interest. Any interest payable under this subparagraph shall accrue on the amounts expended from the date of expenditure at the same rate as specified for interest on investments of the Fund.

(B) If the President refuses to grant all or part of a petition made under this paragraph, the petitioner may within 30 days of receipt of such refusal file an action against the President in the appropriate United States district court seeking reimbursement from the Fund established under this section.

(C) Except as provided in clause (D), to obtain reimbursement, the petitioner shall establish by a preponderance of the evidence that it is not liable for removal costs and damages under subsection (f) of this section and that costs for which it seeks reimbursement are reasonable in light of the action required by the relevant order.

(D) A petitioner who is liable for removal costs and damages under this section may also recover its reasonable costs of response to the extent that it can demonstrate, on the administrative record, that the President's decision in selecting the removal action ordered was arbitrary and capricious or was otherwise not in accordance with law. Reimbursement awarded under this subparagraph shall include all reasonable removal costs incurred by the petitioner pursuant to the portions of the order found to be arbitrary and capricious or otherwise not in accordance with law.

(E) Reimbursement awarded by a court under clause (C) or (D) may include appropriate costs, fees, and other expenses in accordance with subsections (a) and (d) of section 2412 of title 28, United States Code.

(d)(1) In the case of an injury to, destruction of, or loss of natural resources under subsection (a)(2)(C) of this section, liability shall be (A) to the United States Government for natural resources belonging to, managed by, controlled by, or appertaining to the United States, and (B) to any State for natural resources within the State or belonging to, managed by, controlled by, or appertaining to such State, and (C) where subsection (e) of this section applies, to the government of a foreign country for natural resources belonging to, managed by, controlled by, or appertaining to such government. The President, or the authorized representative of any State or of the foreign government, shall act on behalf of the public as trustee of such natural resources to recover for such damages. Sums recovered by the United States Government as trustee under this subsection shall be retained by the trustee, without further appropriation, for use only to restore, replace, or acquire the equivalent of such natural resources, except that the use of such sums to acquire land or interests therein shall be subject to further appropriation and used as specifically provided in appropriation Acts. Sums recovered by a State as trustee under this subsection shall be available for use only to restore, replace, or acquire the equivalent of such natural resources by the State. The measure of damages in any action under subsection (a)(2)(C) shall not be limited by the sums which can be used to restore or replace such resources. There shall be no double recovery under this Act by the same claimant for natural resource damages, including the costs of damage assessment or restoration, rehabilitation, or acquisition for the same discharge and natural resource.

(2)(A) The President shall designate the Federal officials who shall act on behalf of the public as trustees for natural resources under this Act. Such officials shall assess damages for injury to, destruction of, or loss of natural resources for purposes of this Act for those resources under their trusteeship and may, upon request of and reimbursement from a State and at the Federal officials discretion, assess damages for those natural resources under the State's trusteeship.

(B) The Governor of each State shall designate State officials who may act on behalf of the public as trustee for natural resources under this Act and shall notify the President of such designations. Such State officials shall assess damages to natural resources for the purposes of this Act for those natural resources under their trusteeship.

(C) Any determination or assessment of damages to natural resources for the purposes of this Act made by a Federal or State trustee in accordance with the regulations promulgated under paragraph (3) of this subsection shall have the force and effect of a rebuttable presumption on behalf of the trustee in any administrative or judicial proceeding under this Act.

(3)(A) The President, acting through the Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, in consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Director of the Fish and Wildlife Service, and the heads of other affected agencies, not later than two years after the enactment of this Act, shall promulgate regulations for the assessment of damages for injury to, destruction of, or loss of natural resources resulting from a discharge of oil for the purpose of this Act.

(B) Such regulations shall specify: standard procedures for simplified assessments requiring minimal field observation, including establishing measures of damages based on units of discharge or units of affected areas, where damages equal the costs of restoration, replacement, or acquisition of equivalent resources, the diminutions in value of those resources pending restoration; and the need for individual assessments. Such regulations shall identify the best available procedures to determine such damages.

(C) Such regulations shall be reviewed and revised as appropriate every two years.

(e)(1) The recovery of removal costs and damages by (A) persons residing in a foreign country, (B) the government of a foreign country, or (C) any agency or political subdivision of a foreign country, under this Act, shall be exclusively in accordance with this subsection.

(2) A claimant under this subsection must demonstrate that the claimant has not been otherwise compensated for incurred removal costs or damages. Except with respect to paragraph (3)(D) of this subsection, a claimant under this subsection must demonstrate (A) that recovery is authorized by a treaty or executive agreement between the United States and the claimant's country, or (B) that the Secretary of State, in consultation with the Attorney General and other appropriate officials, has certified that the claimant's country provides a comparable remedy for United States claimants.

(3) Where a discharge, or substantial threat of a discharge of oil in or on the territorial sea, internal waters, or adjacent shoreline of a foreign country occurs, claims for removal costs and damages may be made under this subsection if the removal costs or damages resulted from a discharge of, or substantial threat of a discharge, of oil from—

(A) an Outer Continental Shelf facility or a deepwater port facility,

(B) a vessel occurring in the navigable waters of the United States,

(C) a vessel carrying oil as cargo between two ports subject to the jurisdiction of the United States; or

(D) a tanker that received oil at the terminal of the pipeline constructed under the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act for transportation to a port in the United States, the discharge or threat having occurred prior to delivery to that port.

(4) This subsection shall apply only in the case of discharges of oil occurring after the enactment of this Act.

(f)(1) No indemnification, hold harmless, or similar agreement or conveyance shall be effective to transfer from the owner or operator of any vessel or onshore or offshore facility or from any person who may be liable for a discharge or threat of discharge under this section, to any other person the liability imposed under this section. Nothing in this subsection shall bar any agreement to insure, hold harmless, or indemnify a party to such agreement for any liability under this section.

(2) Nothing in this Act, including the provisions of paragraph (1) of this subsection, shall bar a cause of action that an owner or operator subject to liability under this section, or a guarantor, has or would have, by reason of subrogation or otherwise against any person.

(g) The owner or operator of a vessel shall be liable in accordance with this section and section 311 of the Clean Water Act, under maritime tort law, and as provided in section 106 of this Act, notwithstanding any provision of the Act of March 3, 1851 (46 U.S.C. 183), or the absence of any physical damage to the proprietary interest of the claimant.

(h) Solely for the purpose of bringing claims that arise from the discharge of oil, the United States hereby confirms that all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to the lands validly selected but not yet conveyed pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act as amended (43 U.S.C. 1601, et seq.), or the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487), to Alaska Native corporations, are deemed to have vested in the respective corporations as of March 23, 1989.

(2) The President is authorized to delegate the administration of his duties and authorities under this Act to the heads of those Federal departments, agencies, and instrumentalities which the President determines appropriate.

(3)(A) Notwithstanding section 9509(d) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at the request of the Secretary, advance such sums to the Fund in such amount and at such times as are necessary to pay removal costs or damages associated with a discharge or substantial threat of discharge: Provided, That amounts advanced shall not be greater than $1,000,000,000 per incident: Provided further, That the aggregate amount of repayable advances to the Fund which is outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $1,000,000,000 per incident.

Such interest shall be calculated at the average of the highest rate for commercial and finance company paper of maturities of one hundred and eighty days or less obtaining on each of the days included within the period for which the interest must be paid to the claimant, as published in the Federal Reserve bulletin.

(4)(A) The President shall promulgate, and may from time to time amend, regulations for the presentation, filing, processing, settlement, and adjudication of claims for removal costs or damages resulting from the discharge, or substantial threat of a discharge, of oil under this Act.

(B) Whenever the President receives information from any person alleging that a person has incurred removal costs or damages resulting from the discharge, or substantial threat of a discharge, of oil respecting which the owner or operator of a vessel or onshore or offshore facility is or may be liable under section 102 of this Act, the President shall notify the owner, operator, or guarantor of such vessel or facility of that allegation. Such owner or operator or guarantor may, within five days after receiving the notification or presentation of any claim by a claimant, deny the allegation, or deny liability for removal costs and damages for any of the reasons set forth in subsection (b) of section 102 of this Act.

(C) The owner or operator of any vessel or onshore or offshore facility from which oil has been discharged shall provide notice to all potentially injured parties.

(D) No claims may be asserted against the Fund pursuant to subsection (a) unless such claim is presented in the first instance to the owner or operator or guarantor of the vessel or onshore or offshore facility from which oil has been discharged, if known to the claimant, and to any other person known to the claimant who may be liable under section 102. In any case where the claim has not been satisfied within one hundred eighty days of presentation in accordance with this subsection, the claimant may present the claim to the Fund for payment. (d) The Governor of each State, or any appropriate State official designated by the Governor, is authorized to obligate the Fund for the payment of removal costs in an amount not to exceed $250,000 per discharge or substantial threat of discharge of oil, for the purpose of immediate response, subject only to the requirement that the President be notified within twenty-four hours of any such obligation under the authority of this sentence. In addition, the President shall enter into an agreement with the Governor of any interested State to provide a procedure by which the Governor or designated State official may undertake additional removal action or obligate the Fund for the additional payment of removal costs for response to a particular discharge or substantial threat of discharge, subject to such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon. Such agreements shall provide for political subdivisions of the State to receive payments for reasonable removal costs and may authorize advance payments from such account to facilitate such efforts. Payments under subsection (a)(4)(A) of this section, other than as authorized by the first sentence of this subsection, shall be made in accordance with such agreements. The President shall, not later than six months after the enactment of this Act, publish proposed regulations further establishing how the authority of this subsection to obligate the Fund or enter into agreements is to be exercised, and, not later than three months after the close of the comment period on such proposed regulations, shall promulgate such regulations.

Such an action may be commenced against any owner or operator or (subject to section 104(e)) guarantor, or against any other person who is liable, pursuant to any law, to the compensated claimant or to the Fund, for the cost or damages for which the compensation was paid. Such an action shall be commenced against the responsible foreign government or other responsible party to recover any removal costs or damages paid from the Fund as the result of the discharge, or substantial threat of discharge, of oil from a foreign offshore unit.

(f) The Fund shall not be available to pay any claim for costs or damages to the extent the discharge or the damages had been caused by the gross negligence or willful misconduct of that particular claimant.

(g) The Comptroller General shall provide an audit review team to audit all payments, obligations, reimbursements, or other uses of the Fund, to assure that the Fund is being properly administered and that claims are being appropriately and expeditiously considered. The Comptroller General shall submit to the Congress an interim report one year after the establishment of the Fund. The Comptroller General shall thereafter provide such auditing of the Fund as is appropriate. Each Federal agency shall cooperate with the Comptroller General in carrying out this subsection.

(h)(1) No claim may be presented under this section for recovery of removal costs after the date six years after the date of completion of all removal action.

(2) No claim may be presented under this section for recovery of damages unless the claim is presented within three years after the date of the discovery of the loss and its connection with the release in question, or in the case of damages under section 102(a)(2)(C), if later, the date on which final regulations are promulgated under section 102(d)(3) of this Act.

(3) The time limitations contained herein shall not begin to run—

(A) against a minor until the earlier of the date when such minor reaches eighteen years of age or the date on which a legal representative is duly appointed for the minor, or

(i) Where the President has paid out of the Fund for any removal costs or any costs specified under subsection (a) (5) or (6), no other claim may be paid out of the Fund for the same costs.

(j) Except in a situation requiring action to avoid an irreversible loss of natural resources or to prevent or reduce any continuing danger to natural resources or similar need for emergency action, funds may not be used under this Act for the restoration, rehabilitation, or replacement or acquisition of the equivalent of any natural resources until a plan for the use of such funds for such purposes has been developed and adopted by affected Federal agencies and the Governor or Governors of any State having sustained damage to natural resources within its borders, belonging to, managed by or appertaining to such State, after adequate public notice and opportunity for hearing and consideration of all public comment.

(k) In the expenditure of Federal funds for removal of oil, including, but not limited to, distribution of supplies, construction and other reasonable and appropriate activities, which may be carried out by contract or agreement with private persons, preference shall be given, to the extent feasible and practicable, to those private persons residing or doing business primarily in the area affected by the discharge of oil. This section shall not be considered to restrict the use of the Department of Defense resources.

FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY

SEC. 104. (a)(1) The owner or operator of any vessel over three hundred gross tons (except a non-self-propelled barge that does not carry oil as cargo or fuel), using any port or place in the United States or the navigable waters or any outer continental shelf facility or deepwater port facility or the water of the exclusive economic zone to transship or lighter oil destined for a port or place subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, shall establish and maintain, in accordance with regulations promulgated by the President, evidence of financial responsibility sufficient to meet the maximum amount of liability to which, in the case of a tanker, the owner or operator could be subjected under section 102(c)(1)(A) of this Act, or to which, in the case of any other vessel, the owner or operator could be subjected under section 102(c)(1)(B) of this Act, in a case where the owner or operator would be entitled to limit liability under that section. If the owner or operator owns or operates more than one vessel, evidence of financial responsibility need be established only to meet the maximum liability applicable to the largest of such vessels.

(2) The Secretary of the Treasury shall withhold or revoke the clearance required by section 4197 of the Revised Statutes of the United States of any vessel subject to this subsection that does not have the certification required under this subsection or the regulations issued hereunder.

(3) The Secretary of the department in which the Coast Guard is operating may (A) deny entry to any outer continental shelf facility, and deepwater port facility, or any port or place in the United States, or (B) detain at such a facility or port or place, any vessel that, upon request, does not produce the certification required under this subsection or the regulations issued hereunder.

(4) Any vessel subject to the requirements of this subsection which is found in the navigable waters without the necessary evidence of financial responsibility shall be subject to seizure by the United States of any oil carried as cargo.

(b) Each owner or operator with respect to an outer continental shelf facility, deepwater port facility, or other offshore facility, shall establish and maintain evidence of financial responsibility sufficient to meet the maximum amount of liability to which the owner or operator could be subjected under section 102 of this Act in a case where the owner or operator would be entitled to limit liability under that section, or, in the case of an Outer Continental Shelf facility, in the amount of $100,000,000. Such evidence of financial responsibility shall be established according to regulations prescribed by the President.

(c) Financial responsibility under this section may be established by any one, or by any combination, of the following methods, which the President determines to be acceptable: evidence of insurance, surety bond, guarantee, letter of credit, qualification as a self-insurer, or other evidence of financial responsibility. Any bond filed shall be issued by a bonding company authorized to do business in the United States. (d) Any claim for which liability may be established under section 102 of this Act may be asserted directly against any guarantor providing evidence of financial responsibility for an owner or operator liable under that section for costs and damages to which the claim pertains. In defending against such a claim, the guarantor may invoke all rights and defenses which would be available to the responsible party under section 102. The guarantor may also invoke the defense that the discharge was caused by the willful misconduct of the owner or operator, but the guarantor may not invoke any other defense that might be available in proceedings brought by the owner or operator against the guarantor.

(e) The total liability of any guarantor in a suit brought under this section shall be limited to the aggregate amount of the monetary limits of the policy of insurance, guarantee, surety bond, letter of credit, or similar instrument obtained from the guarantor by the person subject to liability under section 102 for the purpose of satisfying the requirement for evidence of financial responsibility. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed to limit any other State or Federal statutory, contractual, or common law liability of a guarantor, including, but not limited to, the liability of such guarantor for bad faith either in negotiation or in failing to negotiate the settlement of any claim. Nothing in this subsection shall be construed, interpreted, or applied to diminish the liability of any person under section 102 of this Act or other applicable law.

The amount of the civil penalty shall be assessed by the President by written notice. In determining the amount of the penalty, the President shall take into account the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the violation, the degree of culpability, any history of prior violation, ability to pay, and such other matters as justice may require. The President may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any civil penalty which is subject to imposition or which has been imposed under this paragraph. If any person fails to pay an assessed civil penalty after it has become final, the President may refer

The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to grant such relief as the public interest and the equities of the case may require.

(g) Any regulation respecting financial responsibility, which has been issued pursuant to any provision of law repealed or superseded by this Act, and which is in effect on the date immediately preceding the effective date of this Act, shall be deemed and construed to be a regulation issued pursuant to this section. Such a regulation shall remain in full force and effect unless and until superseded by new regulations issued under this section.

Such response teams shall—

"(A) consist of such trained personnel and operational equipment from the various Federal agencies as are needed to ensure that an adequate capability exists within each team's geographic area of responsibility to respond promptly and properly with private and public personnel and equipment to a worst case discharge, and to meet the requirements of subsection (d) of this section. Each team shall, through arrangements with private contractors, individual owners and operators of facilities or affected vessels, industry oil spill response organizations, and other such parties within the team's geographic region, ensure that the team is familiar with, and able to exercise immediate direction of, the personnel and equipment available from these sources. To the extent that the private resources necessary to satisfy the requirements of subsection (t) of this section are not sufficient to respond promptly and properly to a worst case discharge, each team shall maintain the capability to obtain immediately such additional trained personnel and operational equipment as are needed for prompt and proper containment, recovery, dispersal, shoreline protection and cleanup, and the protection of fisheries and wildlife in the event of such a discharge;

"(B) review those contingency plans required under subsection (t) of this section that affect each team's particular area of geographic responsibility, and recommend to the President any such changes or modifications that may be needed to ensure a prompt and proper response prior to approval of such contingency plans;

"(C) supervise and review, in conjunction with the States and without prior notice, the practice drills required by subsection (t)(9) of this section, and conduct such additional training and drills as are necessary to demonstrate their continued effectiveness and readiness;

"(D) work with State and local officials to enhance the contingency planning of such officials and assure pre-planning of joint response efforts, including appropriate procedures for mechanical recovery, dispersal, shoreline cleanup, and protection and rescue of fisheries and wildlife. Response teams also shall work with State and local officials to obtain agreements for use of dispersants and other mitigating devices as part of regional contingency plans;

"(E) establish and maintain an inventory of personnel and equipment, in coordination with the international inventory developed under the National Contingency Plan, to support spill response activities, consisting at a minimum of locations, status, and availability of spill response resources and related information;

"(F) conduct regular inspections of the vessels, equipment, facilities, and personnel listed by public and private operators in all contingency plans approved by the President for use in their geographic region of responsibility;

"(G) keep on file and readily accessible all approved contingency plans for their geographic region of responsibility; and

"(H) except where provided otherwise by the President, be under the command of a person designated by the President under subsection (c)(2)(L) of this section.

Contingency plans required under this subsection shall—

"(A) provide full details of the method of response to a worst case oil spill, defined as a discharge, in adverse weather conditions, of the entire cargo of any vessel which is covered by the plan;

"(B) if implemented, be capable, in terms of personnel, materials, and equipment, of promptly and properly—

"(i) entirely without the active participation of any Federal personnel or equipment, removing oil and minimizing any damage to the environment resulting from a maximum probable spill, which shall be defined by the President as no less than the largest historic spill from an oil tanker of the same class as that to which the contingency plan applies, and

"(ii) to the maximum extent practicable, as defined by the President, without the active participation of any Federal personnel or equipment, removing oil and minimizing any damage to the environment resulting from a worst case discharge of the vessel to which the contingency plan applies;

"(C) provide a clear and precise, detailed description of how the plan relates to and is integrated into other approved contingency plans prepared by cooperatives, ports, regional entities and States, and regional oil spill response teams, strike forces and Federal agencies under the National Contingency Plan prepared and published pursuant to subsection (c)(2) of this section;

"(D) provide procedures for early detection of oil spills and timely notification of such spills to the Federal On Scene Coordinator, regional oil spill response teams and strike forces under the National Contingency Plan, prepared and published pursuant to subsection (c)(2) of this section, and other authorities;

"(E) state the number, types, operational capacity and availability of the oil spill containment equipment to be provided to implement the plan;

"(F) state the number, training preparedness and fitness of all full-time, dedicated, pre-positioned personnel assigned to direct and implement the plan;

"(G) incorporate periodic training and drill programs to assure that personnel and equipment to be provided under the plan are in a state of operational readiness at all times;

"(H) state the means of protecting and mitigating effects on the environment, including fish, marine mammals and other wildlife, and ensure that implementation of the plan does not pose unacceptable risks to the public or the environment;

"(I) provide a detailed description of equipment and procedures to be used by the crew of each vessel concerned to minimize damage, stop any spilling from the vessel, contain and cleanup the spilled oil promptly and properly, and determine if and when additional equipment and personnel are needed;

"(J) provide arrangements for the pre-positioning of oil spill containment and cleanup equipment and trained personnel at strategic locations from which they can be deployed to the spill site to promptly and properly remove spilled oil;

"(K) provide arrangements for enlisting the use of additional personnel to implement the plan;

"(L) provide for disposal of recovered spilled oil in accordance with Federal, State, and local laws; and

"(M) describe how implementation of the plan will be coordinated with removal efforts by regional oil spill response teams, including the extent to which dedicated and trained personnel, fully operational vessels, and equipment will be made available to such teams.

"(3) INSPECTION.—Subsequent to issuance of the final rule described in paragraph (2) of this subsection, the President shall provide, through the regional response teams established in subsection (s) of this section and other designated agencies, for regular inspection of vessels, equipment, and facilities to ensure compliance with the requirements of the final rule.

"(4) CONTINGENCY PLAN APPROVAL.—In approving the contingency plans required by this subsection, the President shall consider—

"(A) the adequacy of containment and cleanup equipment, personnel, communications equipment, response time and logistical arrangements for coordination and implementation of response efforts to promptly and properly remove oil spills and protect the environment;

"(B) the nature and amount of vessel traffic within the area covered by the plan;

"(C) the volume and type of oil being transported within the area covered by the plan;

"(D) the existence of navigational hazards within the area covered by the plan;

"(E) any history of prior discharges of oil within the area covered by the plan;

"(F) the value and sensitivity of fisheries and wildlife and other natural resources within the area covered by the plan;

"(G) the comments of potentially affected third parties; and

"(H) relevant information on previous discharges contained in On Scene Coordinator reports prepared by the Coast Guard.

No plan shall be approved unless the President determines that such plan meets the requirements of this subsection and subsection (s) of this section and that such plan, if implemented, is capable, in terms of personnel, materials and equipment, of promptly and properly removing any oil spill and minimizing any damage to the environment as required by paragraph (2)(B) of this subsection.

"(5) NOTIFICATION OF CHANGES.—An owner or operator of a vessel or facility shall immediately notify the President, in writing, of any significant change in any factor set forth under paragraph (5) of this subsection, in order for the President to require changes, if needed, in the plan submitted by such owner or operator.

"(6) STATE APPROVAL OF PLANS.—The President may enter into a cooperative agreement with the chief executive officer of any State to delegate to that State the authority to approve contingency plans consistent with the requirements of this subsection and subsection (t) of this section.

"(7) PROHIBITION.—It shall be unlawful to operate a vessel in or upon the navigable waters of the United States and the exclusive economic zone or to operate a facility that is not in compliance with a contingency plan submitted and approved under this subsection.

"(8) LEGAL EFFECT OF CONTINGENCY PLANS.—The provisions of contingency plans submitted to and approved by the President pursuant to this subsection shall be deemed to be legally binding upon those persons submitting them to the President. The district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to restrain a violation of, compel specific performance of, or otherwise enforce such plans upon application by the President or by any State to which the President has delegated authority for approval of contingency plans under paragraph (7) of this subsection. The President, or any State to which the President has delegated authority for approval of contingency plans under paragraph (6) of this subsection, may issue an order requiring compliance with any contingency plan.

"(9) PUBLIC AWARENESS AND PRACTICE DRILLS.—The President shall publish annually a notice of availability of an up-to-date description of the contingency plans for oil spills submitted and approved pursuant to this subsection and an inventory of equipment available for responding to such spills. The President shall require, without prior notice, practice drills under the contingency plans approved pursuant to this subsection not less than twice each year. The President shall review and publish a report on such drills, including an assessment of actual response time and available equipment and personnel compared to those listed in the contingency plans, and requirements, if any, for changes in the plans or their implementation. The President shall require such additional drills and changes in arrangements for implementing approved plans as are necessary to ensure their effective implementation.

"(10) Each contingency plan submitted and approved pursuant to this subsection shall be kept on file and readily accessible by the oil spill response teams and other officials designated under the National Contingency Plan, relevant State and local officials, affected vessels or facilities and the owner or operator involved.

"(11) Any owner or operator of a vessel or an onshore facility or an offshore facility and any other person subject to any regulation or any order of the President issued under this subsection who fails or refuses to comply with the provisions of this subsection, or any regulations issued thereunder, shall be liable to a civil penalty of not more than $25,000 for each such violation. Each violation shall be a separate offense. The President may assess and compromise such penalty. No penalty shall be assessed until the owner, operator, or other person charged shall have been given notice and an opportunity for a hearing on such charge. In determining the amount of the penalty, or the amount agreed upon in compromise, the gravity of the violation, and the demonstrated good faith of the owner, operator, of other person charged in attempting to achieve rapid compliance after notification of a violation, shall be considered by the President.".

LICENSED PERSONNEL

SEC. 302. (a) INITIATION OF RULEMAKING PROCEEDING.—Within 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall initiate a rulemaking proceeding to require for each affected oil tanker transiting pilotage waters that, except when pilotage of any such tanker is provided by a qualified pilot who is also licensed by a State—

(1) there be one deck officer and one lookout on the navigation bridge in addition to the mate and helmsman on watch, to assist in navigation, communications, and lookout responsibilities;

(2) no less than two individuals on board hold Frist Class Pilot licenses with endorsements for the waters being transited, as issued by the Secretary under section 7101 of title 46, United States Code; and

(3) no less than one of the personnel required by paragraph (1) to be on the navigation bridge fix and record the position of the tanker on a nautical chart of the area at least once every six minutes and, during a period determined by the Secretary of no more than 60 days, retain and make available the annotated chart for inspection by the Secretary.

(b) EFFECTIVE DATE OF FINAL RULE; WAIVER OR MODIFICATION.—A final rule under the proceeding referred to in subsection (a) shall be in effect within 180 days after the date of the enactment of this Act. The final rule may waive or modify any of the requirements specified in subsection (a), to the extent that the Secretary determines such requirement will not substantially enhance oil tanker navigation safety, including protection of the environment.

(c) PILOTAGE REVIEW.—(1) Within 180 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary shall complete and submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives a review of the adequacy of current pilotage regulations in minimizing the risk of oil spills, and shall make a determination as to which, if any, additional areas of the navigable waters of the United States, including the waters of Block Island Sound and Narragansett Bay, shall be considered pilotage waters, as defined in this title, the transit of which warrants additional pilotage or other requirements. This determination shall, at a minimum, include consideration of regions adjacent to vessel traffic lanes that present risks of grounding, accident, or collisions, the type of cargo transported, the volume and nature of vessel traffic, and the sensitivity of the environment.

(2) In completing the review required by paragraph (1), the Secretary shall consider—

(A) the history of oil tanker incidents in pilotage waters, including those which have occurred in the waters of Block Island Sound and Narragansett Bay; and

(B) the relationship, if any, between those incidents and possible deficiencies in the current system of pilotage regulation.

(3) The review shall include such recommendations as the Secretary considers appropriate for modifications in the current system of pilotage regulation to enhance the safety of oil tanker navigation in pilotage waters.

MOTOR VEHICLE DRIVING RECORDS OF VESSEL PERSONNEL

SEC. 303. (a) ACCESS TO REGISTER.—Section 206(b) of the National Driver Register Act of 1982 (23 U.S.C. 401 note) is amended—

The Commandant may receive such information and shall, prior to using such information in any adverse action regarding the merchant mariner's document, license, or certificate of registry of the individual, make such information available to the individual for review and written comment. The Commandant shall not otherwise divulge or use such information, except to verify information required to be reported to the Commandant by an individual applying for such a merchant mariner's document, license, certificate of registry, or renewal and to evaluate whether the individual meets the minimum standards required in order to receive such a merchant mariner's document, license, certificate, or renewal. There shall be no access to information in the Register under this paragraph if such information was entered in the Register more than 5 years before the date of such request, unless such information relates to revocations or suspensions which are still in effect on the date of the request. Information submitted to the Register by States under the Act of July 14, 1960 (74 Stat. 526), or under this title shall be subject to access for the purpose of this paragraph during the transition to the Register described under section 203(c) of this title.".

(2) Section 7704(a) of title 46, United States Code, is amended by inserting, immediately before the period at the end, the following: "and 'serious criminal offense' means a crime so heinous in nature that the commission of such offense would reflect adversely on the offender's character and on the offender's fitness to serve consistent with the interest of safety at sea".

(c) RULEMAKING PROCEEDING.—Not later than 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act, the Commandant shall initiate a rulemaking proceeding to require that each individual who has applied for or received a merchant mariner's document under section 7302 of title 46, United States Code, a license or certificate of registry under section 7101 of title 46, United States Code, or a renewal of such merchant mariner's document, license, or certificate of registry to serve on or operate a commercial vessel shall—

The final rule shall—

(1) be designed to identify those persons who perform such safety sensitive functions on such an oil tanker while impaired by or under the influence of alcohol;

(2) include provisions, procedures, and safeguards analogous to those set forth in the Final Rule published on November 21, 1988, at pages 47064 through 47082 of the Federal Register; and

(3) be published as a final rule within 90 days after enactment of this Act.

(b) INFORMATION ON INDIVIDUAL'S ALCOHOL REHABILITATION.—The Secretary shall conduct a rulemaking proceeding to determine whether to require that the Coast Guard be informed, on a confidential basis, whenever an individual who has applied for or received a license or merchant mariner's document to perform such safety sensitive functions on a commercial vessel is undergoing treatment in an alcohol rehabilitation program. The proceeding shall consider, among other matters—

(1) which categories of individuals shall be subject to such information on their treatment in an alcohol rehabilitation program; and

(2) which persons, including such individuals, the owners and operators of vessels, and organizations representing masters, pilots, and others licensed or documented to perform such safety sensitive functions, shall provide such information.

PROHIBITION ON SERVICE

SEC. 305. The Secretary shall temporarily suspend and take possession of the merchant mariner's document or license of an individual performing safety sensitive functions (as determined by the Secretary) on an affected oil tanker, pending completion of an expedited hearing under chapter 77 of title 46, United States Code, which shall be commenced within 15 days after such temporary suspension, if there is probable cause to believe that the individual—

(1) has served in such capacity while impaired by or under the influence of alcohol;

(2) has been denied a motor vehicle license by a State for cause within the previous five years;

(3) has had any cancellation, revocation, or suspension of a motor vehicle operator's license by a State for cause within the previous five years; or

The ports shall be ranked in order of the priority of that need and the Secretary shall detemine that priority on the basis of such factors as the Secretary considers appropriate, including the nature, volume, and frequency of vessel traffic into and out of such ports, and the risks of collisions, spills, and damages associated with such traffic that could be reduced or eliminated by installation, expansion, or improvement of a VTS system.

(b) USER FEE SYSTEM.—(1) The Secretary may establish and implement a system for the collection of payments by users of VTS systems in ports of the United States.

(2) Any final rule issued by the Secretary to establish and implement such a system shall include a schedule of fees established in accordance with the provisions of section 9701 of title 31, United States Code.

The collection of such fees or payments shall not constitute an express or implied undertaking by the United States to perform any service or activity in a certain manner or to provide any service at a particular time or place.

(c) LIMITATION.—Notwithstanding any other law, except as provided in section 353, the Secretary shall not construct, improve, expand, or operate any new VTS system, unless funds for such construction, improvement, expansion, or operation of the new VTS system were obligated on or before the date of enactment of this Act, until the Secretary has complied with subsection (a).

(2) The Secretary may require other structural or navigational features that the Secretary determines will enhance such oil tanker navigation safety.

(b) REPORT ON TANKER SIZE.—The Secretary shall, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, submit to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation of the Senate and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives a report describing the size, cargo capacity, and flag-nation of affected oil tankers, specifying changes in such size and cargo capacity over the past 20 years, evaluating the extent to which the risks or difficulties associated with oil tanker navigation, vessel traffic control, accidents, oil spills, and the containment and cleanup of such spills are influenced by or related to an increase in such size and cargo capacity, and containing a specific recommendation as to whether limitations on such size or cargo capacity should be imposed to minimize such risks and difficulties. The report shall also contain a recommendation for such legislation as the Secretary determines necessary.

SEC. 355. The Secretary shall, not later than one year after the date of enactment of this Act, issue such regulations as are necessary to ensure that vessels transiting the Mississippi River shall have such capability as the Secretary considers necessary to—

(1) receive marine navigation safety warnings; and

(2) engage in radio communications on designated frequencies with the Coast Guard, other vessels on the Mississippi River, and such stations as may be specified by the Secretary.

FUNDING OF ALASKA PROJECTS AND OIL SPILL RECOVERY INSTITUTE

SEC. 356. Amounts in the Fund established under this Act shall be available, without fiscal year limitation, to carry out the requirements of sections 352 and 353 of this Act. Of amounts in the Fund, $5,000,000 shall be available upon the date of enactment of this Act, and $2,000,000 for each of the nine fiscal years following the fiscal year in which this Act is enacted, to establish and maintain the Prince William Sound Oil Spill Recovery Institute required under section 354 of this Act.

TITLE IV—CONFORMING AMENDMENTS

TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE FUND

SEC. 401. (a) Section 204(b) of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act is amended, in the first sentence—

(1) by inserting after the words "any area" the words "in the State of Alaska";

(2) by inserting after the words "any activities" the words "related to the Trans-Alaska Oil Pipeline"; and

(3) by inserting at the end of the subsection the following new sentence: "This subsection shall not apply to removal costs covered by the Oil Spill Liability and Compensation Act of 1989.".

(b)(1) Subsection (c) of section 204 of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Authorization Act is repealed. This repeal shall have no effect on claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund that arise from discharges subject to section 204(c) of such Act prior to the date of enactment of this Act. Such claims shall be enforceable against the Oil Spill Compensation Fund in accordance with the terms of such section 204(c), as in effect immediately prior to the date of enactment of this Act. The Oil Spill Compensation Fund shall assume all rights and liabilities of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund. All assets of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund shall be transferred to the Fund established under this Act upon the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) The owners of the oil at the time it is loaded on vessels from the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System shall receive credit against amounts due under section 4611 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1986 (26 U.S.C. 4611). Credit shall be allowed only against that portion of amounts due that is attributable to the Oil Spill Liability Trust Fund rate established by section 4611(c) of that Code. The total of all credits under this paragraph shall be equal to the amount transferred from the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund to the Oil Spill Compensation Fund, less any amounts paid in settlement of claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund by the Oil Spill Compensation Fund that are not recovered by the Oil Spill Compensation Fund from other parties. Each owner of oil shall receive a pro-rated share of the credit established by this paragraph. Such share shall be determined by dividing the amount contributed by that owner to the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund by the total amount contributed by all such owners to that Fund and applying the resulting percentage to the total credit available under this paragraph.

(3) For any claims against the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund, the term "damages" shall include but not be limited to the loss of taxes, fees, royalties, rents, or other revenues incurred by a political subdivision of a State due to the injury, destruction, or loss of real property, personal property, or natural resources, or diminished economic activity due to the discharge. This definition shall be deemed to be effective as of January 1, 1989.

(c) Trustees and former trustees of the Trans-Alaska Pipeline Liability Fund shall not be subject to any liability incurred by that Fund or by the present and past officers and trustees of that Fund, other than liability for gross negligence or willful misconduct.

INTERVENTION ON THE HIGH SEAS ACT

SEC. 402. Section 17 of the Intervention on the High Seas Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. The Fund established under the Oil Spill Liability and Compensation Act of 1989 shall be available to the Secretary for actions taken under sections 5 and 7 of this Act.".

CLEAN WATER ACT

SEC. 403. Section 311 of the Clean Water Act is amended as follows:

(a) Subsection (d) is amended by striking out the last sentence.

(b)(1) Subsections (f), (g), and (i) of section 311 of the Clean Water Act shall not apply with respect to any discharge of oil resulting in removal costs for which liability is established under section 102 of this Act, except that natural resource damage assessment regulations, promulgated under section 311(f) of the Clean Water Act shall apply to any such discharges pending the entry into force of such regulations promulgated under section 102 of this Act.

(2) Paragraphs (2) and (3) of subsection (f) are amended by striking out "under subsection (c) for the removal of such oil or substance by the United States Government" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "under subsection (c) for the removal of such oil or substance by the United States Government and for payments made pursuant to section 103(a)(4)(A) of the Oil Pollution Liability and Compensation Act of 1989".

(c) Subsection (i) is amended by striking out "(1)" after "(i)" and striking out paragraphs (2) and (3).

(d) Subsection (k) is repealed. Any amounts remaining in the revolving fund established under that subsection shall be deposited in the Fund established under this Act. The Oil Spill Compensation Fund shall assume all liability incurred by the revolving fund established under section 311(k) of the Clean Water Act.

(e) Subsection (l) is amended by striking out the second sentence.

(f) Subsection (p) is repealed.

(g) Section 311 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(s) The Oil Spill Compensation Fund, established under the Oil Pollution Liability and Compensation Act of 1989, shall be available to carry out subsections (c), (d), (i), and (l) as those subsections apply to discharges, or substantial threats of discharges, of oil. Any amounts received by the United States under this section shall be deposited in such Oil Spill Compensation Fund.".

DEEPWATER PORT ACT

SEC. 404. The Deepwater Port Act of 1974 is amended as follows:

(a) In section 4(c)(1) strike "section 18(l) of this Act;" and insert in lieu thereof "section 104 of the Oil Spill Liability and Compensation Act of 1989,".

(b) Subsections (b), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (l), (n), and paragraph (1) of subsection (m) of section 18 are deleted.

(c) Paragraph (3) of subsection (c) of section 18 is amended by striking "Deepwater Port Liability Fund established pursuant to subsection (f) of this section", and inserting in lieu thereof "fund established under the Oil Spill Liability and Compensation Act of 1989".

(d) Subsections (c), (k), and (m) of section 18 are redesignated (b), (c), and (d) respectively, and paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subsection (m) are redesignated (1), (2), and (3), respectively.

(e) Any amounts remaining in the Deepwater Port Liability Fund, established under section 18(f) of the Deepwater Port Act of 1974, shall be deposited in the Fund established under this Act. The Oil Spill Compensation Fund shall assume all liability incurred by the Deepwater Port Liability Fund.

The Oil Spill Compensation Fund shall assume all liability incurred by the Offshore Oil Pollution Compensation Fund.

TITLE V—OVERSIGHT AND MONITORING

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 501. This title may be cited as the "Oil Terminal Environmental Oversight and Monitoring Act of 1989".

FINDINGS

SEC. 502. The Congress finds that—

(1) the March 24, 1989, grounding and rupture of the fully loaded oil tanker, the Exxon Valdez, spilled eleven million gallons of crude oil in Prince William Sound, an environmentally sensitive area;

(2) many people believe that complacency on the part of the industry and government personnel responsible for monitoring the operation of the Valdez terminal and vessel traffic in Prince William Sound was one of the contributing factors to the Exxon Valdez oil spill;

(3) one way to combat this complacency is to involve local citizens in the process of preparing, adopting, and revising oil spill contingency plans;

(4) a mechanism should be established which fosters the long-term partnership of industry, government, and local communities in overseeing compliance with environmental concerns in the operation of crude oil terminals;

(5) such a mechanism presently exists at the Sullom Voe terminal in the Shetland Islands and this terminal should serve as a model for others;

(6) because of the effective partnership that has developed at Sullom Voe, Sullom Voe is considered the safest terminal in Europe;

(7) the present system of regulation and oversight of crude oil terminals in the United States has degenerated into a process of continual mistrust and confrontation;

(8) only when local citizens are involved in the process will the trust develop that is necessary to change the present system from confrontation to consensus;

(9) a pilot program patterned after Sullom Voe should be established in Alaska to further refine the concepts and relationships involved; and

(10) similar programs should eventually be established in other major crude oil terminals in the United States because the recent oil spills in Texas, Delaware, and Rhode Island indicate that the safe transportation of crude oil is a national problem.

DEMONSTRATION PROJECTS OF OIL TERMINAL ENVIRONMENTAL OVERSIGHT AND MONITORING PROGRAMS

SEC. 503. There are established two Oil Terminal Environmental Oversight and Monitoring Demonstration Programs (hereinafter referred to as the "Program") in Alaska. One Program shall be responsible for environmental oversight and monitoring of the Alyeska terminal facilities at Valdez in Prince William Sound. The other Program shall be responsible for environmental oversight and monitoring of the terminal facilities on the Kenai Peninsula in Cook Inlet.

OIL TERMINAL FACILITIES OPERATIONS ASSOCIATION

SEC. 504. (a) There is established an Oil Terminal Facilities Operations Association (hereinafter referred to as the "Association") for each of the Programs established in section 503. Each Association shall be comprised of four individuals. Two individuals shall be designated by the industrial users, owners, and operators of the terminal facilities and shall represent those users, owners, and operators. One individual shall be an employee of the State of Alaska, shall be designated by the Governor of the State of Alaska, and shall represent the State government. One individual shall be an employee of the Federal Government, shall be designated by the President of the United States, and shall represent the Federal Government.

(b) The Association shall be responsible for establishing and reviewing all policies relating to the operation and maintenance of the oil terminal facilities which affect or may affect the environment in the vicinity of the terminal. The Association shall provide a forum between the industrial users, owners, and operators of the terminal facilities and the United States and State of Alaska governments for the discussion and resolution of all permits, plans, and site specific regulations governing the activities and actions of the terminal facilities which affect or may affect the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities.

OIL TERMINAL ENVIRONMENTAL ADVISORY COUNCIL

SEC. 505. (a) There is established an Oil Terminal Environmental Advisory Council (hereinafter referred to as the "Council") for each of the Programs established by section 503.

(b) Each Council shall be composed of 16 members as follows:

(1) one cochairman appointed by the President;

(2) one cochairman appointed by the Governor of the State of Alaska;

(3) two representatives selected by the industrial users, owners, and operators of the terminal facilities;

(4) two representatives selected by the fishing industry which depends and relies upon the fisheries resources of the waters in vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(5) one representative from each of the following—

(A) Environmental Protection Agency;

(B) Coast Guard; and

(C) Department of the Interior;

(6) one representative from each of the following State agencies or departments of the State of Alaska—

(A) Department of Environmental Conservation;

(B) Department of Fish and Game; and

(C) Department of Natural Resources or Department of Commerce and Economic Development;

(7) one representative selected by the Alaska Native Corporations and other Alaska Native organizations the members of which reside in the vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(8) one representative selected by the environmental organizations the members of which reside in the vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(9) one representative selected by the mayors of the boroughs and municipalities in the vicinity of the terminal facilities; and

(10) one representative selected by the Alaska State Chamber of Commerce.

(c) In appointing cochairman of the Council, the President and the Governor of Alaska shall seek individuals who have had a long-term relationship with the State of Alaska, a background in the areas of natural resources and environmental sciences, and recognized leadership capabilities.

(d) No individual selected as a member of the Council shall serve on the Association.

(e) The Council shall advise and make recommendations to the Association on all policies, permits, and site specific regulations relating to the operation and maintenance of terminal facilities which affect or may affect the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities. In particular, the Council shall—

(1) monitor, through the Monitoring Committee established pursuant to section 506, the environmental impacts of the operation of the terminal facilities;

(2) oversee those aspects of terminal facilities operations and maintenance which affect or may affect the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(3) review, through the Oil Spill Committee established pursuant to section 507, the adequacy of oil spill contingency plans for the terminal facilities; and

(4) recommend to the Association—

(A) standards for permits and site specific regulations intended to minimize the impact of terminal facilities operations on the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(B) modifications in terminal facilities operations and maintenance intended to minimize the impact of terminal facilities operations on the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities;

(C) modifications in terminal facilities operations and maintenance intended to minimize the risk of oil spills; and

(D) modifications to the oil spill contingency plan for the terminal facilities intended to enhance the ability to respond to an oil spill.

SCIENTIFIC COMMITTEE FOR ENVIRONMENTAL MONITORING

SEC. 506. (a) Each Council shall establish a standing scientific committee (hereinafter referred to as the "Monitoring Committee") to devise and manage a comprehensive program of monitoring of the environmental impacts of terminal facilities operations. The membership of the Monitoring Committee shall be made up of recognized scientific experts selected by the Council.

(b) In fulfilling its responsibilities, the Monitoring Committee shall—

(1) advise the Council on a monitoring strategy that will permit early detection of environmental impacts of terminal facilities operations;

(2) define the requirements of monitoring programs and making recommendations to the Council on the implementation of those programs;

(3) select and contract with universities and other scientific institutions to carry out specific monitoring projects authorized by the Council pursuant to an approved monitoring strategy; and

(4) provide written reports to the Council which interpret and assess the results of all monitoring programs.

TECHNICAL COMMITTEE FOR OIL SPILL PLANNING AND PREPAREDNESS

SEC. 507. (a) The Council shall establish a standing technical committee (hereinafter referred to as the "Oil Spill Committee") to review and assess the planning and preparation for responding to, containing, and cleaning up oil spills. The membership of the Oil Spill Committee shall be made up of recognized technical experts selected by the Council.

(b) In fulfilling its responsibilities, the Oil Spill Committee shall—

(1) periodically review the oil spill contingency plans for the terminal facilities in light of new technological developments and changed circumstances;

(2) participate in periodic drills and testing of the oil spill contingency plans for the terminal facilities;

(3) study wind and water currents and other environmental factors in the vicinity of the terminal facilities which may affect the ability to respond to, contain, and clean-up an oil spill;

(4) identify highly sensitive areas in the vicinity of the terminal facilities which may require specific protective measures in the event of an oil spill;

(5) monitor developments in oil spill containment, response and cleanup technology; and

(6) provide written reports to the Council outlining its findings and recommendations.

On and after the expiration of the 180-day period following the date of enactment of this title, each Federal department, agency, or other instrumentality shall, with respect to all permits, site specific regulations, and other matters governing the activities and actions of the terminal facilities which affect or may affect the environment in the vicinity of the terminal facilities, consult with the appropriate Council prior to taking substantive action with respect to such permit, site specific regulation, or other matter. Such consultation shall be carried out with a view to enabling the appropriate Association and Council to review such permit, site specific regulation, or other matter and make recommendations with respect thereto.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE COUNCIL

SEC. 509. In the event that the Association does not adopt or significantly modifies before adoption any recommendation of the Council made pursuant to the authority granted to the Council in subsection (e) of section 505, the Association shall provide, in writing within 5 days of its decision, to the cochairmen of the Council notice of its decision and a written statement of reasons for its rejection or significant modification of the recommendation.

GENERAL PROVISIONS

PENALTIES

SEC. 601. Section 24(b) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act (43 U.S.C. 1350(b)) is amended—

(1) by striking "If any" and inserting in lieu thereof "(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), if any";

(2) by striking "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$20,000";

COOPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT OF COMMON HYDROCARBON-BEARING AREAS

SEC. 602. (a) AMENDMENT TO THE OUTER CONTINENTAL SHELF LANDS ACT.—Section 5 of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as amended (42 U.S.C. Sec. 1334), is amended by adding a new subsection (j) as follows:

"(j) COOPERATIVE DEVELOPMENT OF COMMON HYDROCARBON-BEARING AREAS.—

"(1) FINDINGS.—

"(A) The Congress of the United States finds that the unrestrained competitive production of hydrocarbons from a common hydrocarbon-bearing geological area underlying the Federal and State boundary may result in a number of harmful national effects, including—

"(I) the drilling of unnecessary wells, the installation of unnecessary facilities and other imprudent operating practices that result in economic waste, environmental damage and damage to life and property;

"(II) the physical waste of hydrocarbons and an unnecessary reduction in the amounts of hydrocarbons that can be produced from certain hydrocarbon-bearing areas; and

"(III) the loss of correlative rights which can result in the reduced value of national hydrocarbon resources and disorders in the leasing of Federal and State resources.

"(2) The Secretary shall prevent, through the cooperative development of an area, the harmful effects of unrestrained competitive production of hydrocarbons from a common hydrocarbon-bearing area underlying the Federal and State boundary.".

(b) EXCEPTION FOR WEST DELTA FIELD.—Section 5(j) of the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act, as added by this section, shall not be applicable with respect to Blocks 17 and 18 of the West Delta Field offshore Louisiana.

(c) AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS.—There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to provide compensation, including interest, to the State of Louisiana and its lessees, for net drainage of oil and gas resources as determined in the Third Party Factfinder Louisiana Boundary Study dated March 21, 1989. For purposes of this section, such lessees shall include those persons with an ownership interest in State of Louisiana leases SL10087, SL10088 or SL10187, or ownership interests in the production or proceeds therefrom, as established by assignment, contract or otherwise. Interest shall be computed for the period March 21, 1989 until the date of payment.

REPORT ON AGREEMENTS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA GOVERNING LIABILITY FOR POTENTIAL OIL SPILLS IN THE GREAT LAKES AND THE ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AND INTERNATIONAL CONTINGENCY PLANS

SEC. 603. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Great Lakes contain 95 percent of the United States' and 20 percent of the world's fresh surface water, providing drinking water for approximately twenty-five million Americans, supporting 20 percent of all United States manufacturing, providing habitat for thousands of wildlife species, and providing invaluable recreational opportunities and businesses for millions of people;

(2) last year four United States and twenty-two Canadian tanker vessels carried eighty-one million barrels of petroleum and hazardous materials through the Great Lakes;

(3) the Great Lakes are particularly vulnerable to oil spills, because they contain fresh water and are a closed system, without a larger sea to help disperse contaminants and reduce retention time;

(4) the potential for a disastrous oil spill on the Great Lakes was recently demonstrated in March 1989, when the Canadian tank barge Scurry narrowly avoided the release of one million four hundred thousand gallons of carbon black feedstock when it ran aground twice on the Detroit River, near the drinking water intakes which serve nearly three million people;

(5) the near miss in March of 1989 was not an isolated incident, and hundreds of smaller spills have actually occurred in recent years on the Great Lakes; and

(6) concerns have been raised about inadequate requirements by the United States and Canada on the prevention and remediation of oil spills in the Great Lakes, including questions about measures on double-hulled tankers, double-skinned barges, vessel inspections, pilotage rules, spill notifications, spill contingency plans, containment equipment, wildlife rehabilitation facilities, clean-up procedures and the allocation of liability.

(b) REPORT.—The Secretary of State shall review the international agreements and treaties with the Republic of Canada, including relevant provisions in the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978, as amended by the Protocol of 1987, and the Canada-United States Marine Pollution substances, in order to determine whether amendments or additional international agreements are necessary to resolve complex questions of recovery of damages in the event of an oil spill in the Great Lakes and to ensure the adequacy of measures to prevent and remediate such spills. To the extent possible, the Secretary of State shall consult with the United States Coast Guard, the Environmental Protection Agency, and States surrounding the Great Lakes during this review.

(c) REPORT.—The Secretary of State shall report to the Congress on the results of this review within thirty days of the date of enactment.

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA GOVERNING LIABILITY FOR POTENTIAL OIL SPILLS IN THE ARCTIC OCEAN AND INTERNATIONAL CONTINGENCY PLANS

SEC. 604. (a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) Canada has discovered commercial quantities of oil and gas in the Amalagak region of the Northwest Territory;

(2) Canada is currently exploring alternatives for transporting the oil from the Amalagak field to markets in Asia and the Far East;

(3) one of the options the Canadian government is exploring involves transshipment of oil from the Amalagak field across the Beaufort Sea to tankers which would transport the oil overseas;

(4) the tankers would traverse the American Exclusive Economic Zone through the Beaufort Sea into the Chukchi Sea and then through the Bering Straits;

(5) these waters serve as the kitchen table for Alaska's native people providing them with sustenance in the form of walrus, seals, fish, and whales;

(6) the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas provide important habitat for the bowhead whale, the lifeblood of the Eskimo people of Alaska;

(7) an oil spill in the Arctic Ocean, if not properly dealt with, could have significant impacts on the indigenous people of Alaska's North Slope;

(8) The Canadian Arctic Waters Pollution Act limits recovery of damages incurred as a result of offshore exploration or development to $C40 million and does not apply west of 141 degrees latitude;

(9) the Canadian government has entered into an agreement with all companies licensed to drill in the Canadian Beaufort mandating liability to United States; claimants for damages suffered west of 141 degrees latitude, but that liability is limited to $C20 million.

(10) there is no international agreement in effect between the United States and Canada outlining legal liability in the event of an oil spill; and

(11) there are no international contingency plans involving our two governments governing containment and cleanup of an oil spill in the Arctic Ocean.

(b) NEGOTIATIONS.—The Congress calls upon the Secretary of State of the United States of America and the Foreign Minister of the Republic of Canada to begin negotiations on a treaty dealing with the complex questions of recovery of damages, contingency plans, and coordinated actions in the event of an oil spill in the Arctic Ocean or a tanker accident during the shipment of oil by sea.

(c) REPORT.—The Secretary of State shall report to the Congress on his efforts toward this end no later than January 1, 1990.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill, as amended, was passed.

Mr. CHAFEE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement before proceeding to the next matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. President, I am very grateful and very much thank the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. President, I want to publicly thank the Senator from Rhode Island for his very hard work and very cooperative work in passage of this legislation. It has been very good to work with the Senator from Rhode Island.

I also thank the chairman of the committee, Senator BURDICK from North Dakota. Senator BURDICK helped make this bill possible and in fact was largely responsible for the passage of this bill and he should be commended.

I also want to particularly thank the senior members of the Commerce Committee. This legislation has been a joint effort. The Environment and Public Works Committee has been working with the Commerce Committee. Senator HOLLINGS, the chairman of the committee, was very helpful, and I particularly want to thank the Senator from Alaska [Mr. STEVENS] who has been very diligent, spent a good part of the last 24 hours on the floor helping coordinate the Commerce Committee course on the bill with the Environment and Public Works Committee.

Lastly, and probably most importantly, Mr. President, I thank the Environment and Public Works Committee staff, who worked even harder than we by far, which includes Katharine Kimball, Jeff Peterson, Robert Davison, and Bill Bonvillian. I think they should be commended again for their diligence and valiant efforts. They are really the ones who made this possible.

With that, Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity to thank the distinguished Senator from Montana for the excellent work he did in this legislation. As has been pointed out many times, Montana has no coastline and for the Senator to take the intense interest he did in this piece of legislation which was primarily of concern for those who lived on the coasts was remarkable, and I send my deep gratitude to him for his patience and perseverance, and consideration of everyone involved.

And I extend my thanks also, of course, to the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, who has been deeply interested in this legislation for many years, and this is in many ways a triumph for him to have it pass 99 to nothing.

I also want to thank the chairman of the committee, Senator BURDICK, for his support throughout our deliberations.

As for the staff, I echo what the distinguished manager of the bill, Senator BAUCUS, said. On this side, Rich Innes, Bob Hurley, Steve Shimberg, Janet Coit, and on that side we worked most closely with Ms. Kate Kimball, who has been extraordinary on details and mastery of all the facts of this.

I want to thank everybody involved and also, Mr. President, to say something about the Senators from Alaska, both the senior Senator and the junior Senator, because they are very, very involved with this type of legislation.

As a result of all this, it came out successfully and I look forward to a successful, although I am sure it might be a tedious and perhaps long, conference with the House on this.

I thank the Chair.

(g) Nothing in this section may be construed to permit or require the payment to any employee covered by this section at a rate in excess of the rate that would be payable were this section not in effect.

(h) The Office of Personnel Management may provide for exceptions to the limitations imposed by this section if the Office determines that such exceptions are necessary to ensure the recruitment or retention of qualified employees.

(c) The exemptions in part (b) of this section are not intended to apply to information on the use of personnel detailed to or from the intelligence agencies which is currently being supplied to the Senate and House Intelligence and Appropriations Committees by the executive branch through budget justification materials and other reports.

(d) For the purposes of this section, the term "Executive agency" has the same meaning as defined under section 105 of title 5, United States Code (except that the provisions of section 104(2) of title 5, United States Code shall not apply) and includes the White House Office, the Executive Residence, and any office, council, or organizational unit of the Executive Office of the President.

[SEC. 617. (a) None of the funds made available by this or any other Act with respect to any fiscal year may be used to make a contract for the manufacture of distinctive paper for United States currency and securities pursuant to section 5114 of title 31, United States Code, with any corporation or other entity owned or controlled by persons not citizens of the United States, or for the manufacture of such distinctive paper outside of the United States or its possessions. This subsection shall not apply if the Secretary of the Treasury determines that no domestic manufacturer of distinctive paper for United States currency or securities exists with which to make a contract and if the Secretary of the Treasury publishes in the Federal Register a written finding stating the basis for the determination.

[SEC. 618. TEMPORARY AUTHORITY TO TRANSFER LEAVE.—In order to ensure that the experimental use of voluntary leave transfers established under Public Laws 99-500, 99-591, and 100-202 may continue and may cover additional employees in fiscal year 1990, the Office of Personnel Management may continue to operate by regulation, notwithstanding chapter 63 of title 5, United States Code, a program under which the unused accrued annual leave of officers or employees of the Federal Government may be transferred for use by other officers or employees who need such leave due to a personal emergency as defined in the regulations. The Office may provide by regulation for such exceptions from the provisions of section 7351 of title 5 as the Office may determine appropriate for the transfer of leave under this section. The Veterans' Administration may operate a similar program for employees subject to section 4108 of title 38, United States Code. The programs operated under this section shall expire at the end of fiscal year 1990, but any leave that has been transferred to an officer or employee under the programs shall remain available for use until the personal emergency has ended, and any remaining unused transferred leave shall, to the extent administratively feasible, be restored to the leave accounts of the officers or employees from whose accounts it was originally transferred.]

SEC. [619] 615. No funds appropriated in this or any other Act for fiscal year 1990 may be used to implement or enforce the agreements in Standard Forms 312 and 4355 of the Government or any other nondisclosure policy, form or agreement if such policy, form or agreement:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall affect the enforcement of those aspects of such nondisclosure policy, form or agreement that do not fall within subsection (1)-(5) of this section.

SEC. [620] 616. (a)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in the case of fiscal year 1990, the overall average percentage of the adjustment under section 5305 of title 5, United States Code, in the rates of pay under the General Schedule, and in the rates of pay under the other statutory pay systems (as defined by section 5301(c) of such title), shall be an increase of 3.6 percent.

(2) Each increase in a pay rate or schedule which takes effect pursuant to paragraph (1) shall, to the maximum extent practicable, be of the same percentage, and shall take effect as of the first day of the first applicable pay period commencing on or after January 1, 1990.

(b)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any other law, no adjustment in rates of pay under section 5305 of title 5, United States Code, which becomes effective on or after October 1, 1989, and before October 1, 1990, shall have the effect of increasing the rate of salary or basic pay for any office or position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch or in the government of the District of Columbia—

(A) if the rate of salary or basic pay payable for that office or position as of September 30, 1989, was equal to or greater than the rate of basic pay described in paragraph (3); or

(B) to a rate exceeding the rate of basic pay described in paragraph (3) if, as of September 30, 1989, the rate of salary or basic pay payable for that office or position was less than the rate described in such paragraph.

(2) For purposes of paragraph (1), the rate of salary or basic pay payable as of September 30, 1989, for any office or position which was not in existence on such date shall be deemed to be the rate of salary or basic pay payable to individuals in comparable offices or positions on such date, as determined under regulations prescribed—

(A) by the President, in the case of any office or position within the executive branch or in the government of the District of Columbia;

(B) jointly by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President pro tempore of the Senate, in the case of any office or position within the legislative branch; or

(C) by the Chief Justice of the United States, in the case of any office or position within the judicial branch.

(3) The rate of basic pay described in this paragraph is the rate equal to the rate of basic pay payable for level III of the Executive Schedule under section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, as of September 30, 1989, increased by 3.6 percent.

[(c) It is the sense of the Congress that funding for any pay increase under this section should not be provided in a way that would be disruptive to the Federal workforce (such as if it would result in any involuntary separations or other adverse personnel actions) or compromise the quality or diminish the range of services provided by the Government.]

SEC. [621] 617. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no executive branch agency shall purchase, construct, and/or lease any additional facilities, except within or contiguous to existing locations to be used for the purpose of conducting Federal law enforcement training without the advance approval of the House and Senate Committees on Appropriations.

SEC. [622] 618. None of the funds appropriated by this or any other Act may be expended by any Federal agency to procure any product or service that is subject to the provisions of Public Law 89-306 and that will be available under the procurement by the Administrator of General Services known as "FTS2000" unless—

(1) such product or service is procured by the Administrator of General Services as part of the procurement known as "FTS2000"; or

(2) that agency establishes to the satisfaction of the Administrator of General Services that—

(A) the agency's requirements for such procurement are unique and cannot be satisfied by property and service procured by the Administrator of General Services as part of the procurement known as "FTS2000"; and

SEC. [623] 619. (a) No department, agency, or instrumentality of the United States receiving appropriated funds under this Act for fiscal year 1990, or under any other Act appropriating funds for fiscal year 1990, shall obligate or expend any such funds, unless such department, agency, or instrumentality has in place, and will continue to administer in good faith, a written policy designed to ensure that all of its workplaces are free from the illegal use, possession, or distribution of controlled substances (as defined in the Controlled Substances Act) by the officers and employees of such department, agency, or instrumentality.

(b) No funds so appropriated to any such department, agency, or instrumentality shall be available for payment in connection with any grant, contract, or other agreement, unless the recipient of such grant, contract or party to such agreement, as the case may be, has in place and will continue to administer in good faith a written policy, adopted by such recipient, contractor, or party's board of directors or other governing authority, satisfactory to the head of the department, agency, or instrumentality making such payments, designed to ensure that all of the workplaces of such recipient, contractor, or party are free from the illegal use, possession, or distribution of controlled substances (as defined in the Controlled Substances Act) by the officers and employees of such recipient, contractor, or party.

SEC. 621. Notwithstanding section 1346 of title 31, United States Code, or section 608 of Public Law 100-440, funds made available for fiscal year 1990 by this or any other Act shall be available for the interagency funding of national security and emergency preparedness telecommunications initiatives which benefit multiple Federal departments, agencies, or entities, as provided by Executive Order Numbered 12472 (April 3, 1984).

"(e)(1) The Senior Executive Service shall be a service in which rank and rate of pay are based on the performance of an individual and not on the position in which such individual is employed.

"(2) The Office of Personnel Management, or any department or agency may not prescribe or enforce any regulation that—

"(A) sets qualification or classification standards for admission or service in the Senior Executive Service which is not based on the requirement of paragraph (1); or

"(B) violates the requirement of paragraph (1) relating to the status of any career appointee in the Senior Executive Service.".

(b) Section 5383 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(e)(1) If a career appointee in the Senior Executive Service is reassigned or transferred under section 3395, or accepts an assignment under sections 3372 and 3373, such appointee shall retain his rank and rate of pay regardless of the designation of rate of pay and rank of the position to which the appointee is transferred or assigned.

"(2) If any agency coerces or requires a career appointee to accept a position described under paragraph (1) at a lower rate of pay or rank, such employee may file a complaint with the Merit Systems Protection Board, Office of Special Counsel as a prohibited personnel practice.

"(f) The rate of pay of a career appointee in the Senior Executive Service may not be reduced, unless such reduction is based on the poor performance or misconduct of such appointee.".

(c) Section 5384(c) of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "In the case of performance awards paid by any agency under this section to career appointees, any such award shall be based on recommendations by a performance review board with a membership that consists of more than one-half career appointees.".

(d)(1) Chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 5724c the following new section:

"§ 5724d. Relocation bonuses for career appointees

"Subject to regulation to the Office of Personnel Management, an agency may pay a relocation bonus of an amount no less than 15 percent and no greater than 25 percent of the annual compensation based on the basic rate of pay of a career appointee in the Senior Executive Service to such an appointee, if the agency determines that a bonus is appropriate to attract highly qualified career appointees for a position located in an area which is geographically undesirable because of local cost-of-living factors.".

(2) The table of sections for chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 5724c the following:

CONFIRMATION OF GILBERT CARMICHAEL TO BE ADMINISTRATOR OF THE FEDERAL RAILROAD ADMINISTRATION

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, the Senate has expressed its consent to the confirmation of Gilbert Carmichael of Mississippi to be Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration.

I was really delighted that the Senate expressed its consent in a timely fashion to this nomination because he is one of the finest citizens of the State of Mississippi. He has had a career of over 30 years that has been very much a positive influence in the economic, political and civic life of the State of Mississippi. He has been a leader in his community and throughout our State.

An article that I inserted in the RECORD during consideration of his confirmation clearly indicated that he has a unique place in the history of the political life of our State. He is very well qualified for this particular job because of his many assignments in transportation areas of responsibility both at the State and the national level.

I predict he is going to serve with great distinction as our new Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration.

I thank the Chair for the time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BRIG. GEN. HARRY W. JENKINS, JR.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, one of the finest pleasures all of us have in serving this body is the opportunity to publicly acknowledge some of the outstanding patriots of our Nation. I wish to say goodbye to Brig. Gen. Harry W. Jenkins, Jr., who served as the legislative assistant to the Commandant of the Marine Corps since September 1987. Harry has been a vital link between the Marine Corps, the Department of the Navy, and the U.S. Senate. It has been my privilege to work with him on numerous occasions, covering a variety of military issues. In August, Harry is returning to the Fleet Marine Force to command the Fouth Marine Expeditionary Brigade located in Norfolk, VA. Although his departure is going to be a great loss to us, the officers and marines of the brigade will gain a superb leader and a proven tactician, reflecting on his past successes while commanding forces along NATO's northern flank.

Over the past 2 years, Harry has earned the respect, gratitude and friendship of my distinguished colleagues. He has performed his duties in a loyal, professional manner at all times, whether it was accompanying Senator's on fact-finding missions or providing information on critical issues of the day relating to the Marine Corps. I believe I speak for this entire body when I say that I will miss the conscientious approach that Harry brings to all his duties. I worked with him on all kinds of issues from troop strength, procurement, even Idaho seed potato certification which is done at Camp Pendleton, CA.

It has truly been an honor and a privilege for me to know and work with this outstanding marine. I thank him for his tremendous dedication, and I want him to know that his contributions have made a significant difference for the Armed Forces of the United States, and good relations between the U.S. Marine Corps and Congress.

So I bid farewell to our friend Harry Jenkins as he takes his new command. The country could not have a greater patriot and the Marines a better officer. Semper Fi.

TREASURY, POST OFFICE, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, AND INDEPENDENT AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1990

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate turn to the consideration of H.R. 2989 a bill making appropriations for the Department of Treasury, U.S. Postal Service, the Executive Office of the President and certain Independent Agencies for fiscal year 1990 and for other purposes.

I further ask unanimous consent that the committee amendments to H.R. 2989 be considered and agreed to en bloc provided that no point of order be waived thereon and that the measure as amended be considered as original text for the purpose of further amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, along with my distinguished Ranking Member, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. DOMENICI] I am pleased to bring before the Senate, H.R. 2989, the Treasury Department Appropriations Act for Fiscal Year 1990. The bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations, is within the 302(b) allocations for budget authority and outlays. It contains $18,411,603,000 in new budget authority and $17,932,329,000 in budget outlays. This amount is $6,512 million below the President's request and $11,209 million under the House allowance.

Mr. President, the Department of Treasury appropriations bill funds all of the Treasury law enforcement agencies like the U.S. Customs Service, which has primary responsibility over the protection of our Nation's borders from the illegal entry of narcotics and other contraband; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, which carries out all law enforcement investigations related to firearms violations; the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, which provides consolidated law enforcement training for the majority of our Federal as well as State and local law enforcement agencies; and last, but not least, the newly established Office of National Drug Control Policy, which has primary executive branch responsibility for the formulation of national drug policy and oversight. The bill also provides funding for our Nation's largest revenue producer, the Internal Revenue Service, and many other Federal agencies whose responsibility it is to carry out general governmental functions. The bill also contains funding for the Executive Office of the President agencies as well as a number of independent agencies like the General Services Administration and the Office of Personnel Management. In fiscal year 1990, the committee bill recommends a funding level of $5,211,732,000 for the payment to the civil service retirement and disability fund; and $3,780,169,000 for the Government payment for annuitants and employee health benefits. These levels of funding represent an increase of $570,988,000 over the fiscal year 1989 enacted level.

Mr. DOMENICI. Will the Senator yield?

The Senate is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WIRTH). The Senate will be in order.

The Senator from Arizona may continue.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, this year it was particularly difficult to formulate a bill which provided the minimum funding levels necessary to carry out the enormous responsibilities of the many and varied programs funded under this bill. While the bipartisan budget agreement assumed current service levels for most Federal programs, it did not assume the increases required to maintain current levels or fund the enhancements contained in the President's budget request. The Treasury/Postal Service Subcommittee's 302(b) allocation for fiscal year 1990 was $22,000,000 less than the President's budget request and $25,000,000 less than CBO's current services estimate for budget outlays. In addition, due to statutory requirements, the subcommittee had to fund three new accounts which include the Office of the Inspector General, Department of Treasury; Office of the Inspector General, Office of Personnel Management; and the Office of Government Ethics. As in past years, the administration has once again proposed a major funding increase of $348,000,000 for the Internal Revenue Service to achieve, among other things, an additional $450 million in revenues for deficit reduction purposes assumed in the bipartisan budget agreement. This $348 million increase is also needed to provide improved service to taxpayers who call or write the IRS for information concerning their tax returns. In fiscal year 1990, the IRS proposes to maintain an 85-percent level of service to taxpayers and improve the accuracy of the information being passed on to the taxpayers through the conversion of temporary and seasonal employees to permanent positions. Perhaps the most important increase contained in the IRS budget for fiscal year 1990 is an additional $80 million for the redesign of our tax system. Mr. President, without a major overhaul of the IRS automated data processing systems, the IRS will reach peak capacity by as early as 1994. If this should occur without a backup system, this Nation would be faced with a major revenue loss. This is the first time in many years, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations has been able to provide the full amount requested by the President for the Internal Revenue Service.

For the general government agencies like the Financial Management Service, which processes all of the checks issued by the Federal Government; the U.S. Mint, which plans to produce 19.5 billion coins in fiscal year 1990, and the Bureau of the Public Debt, which is responsible for administering all of the laws and regulations pertaining to public debt financing, the bill contains modest increases to permit these agencies to cover the costs of increased workloads in fiscal year 1990. The people who work in these agencies our unsung heros—the work they do is part of the nuts and bolts which holds the Federal Government together.

Having said that, Mr. Chairman, I believe the bill that we are recommending to the Senate is fair and balanced. The ranking member, Mr. DOMENICI and I have shaped a bill which provides the full amounts requested by the President for the Treasury departmental offices, the Financial Management Service, the Bureau of the Public Debt and the mint. It also contains the requested level of funding for most of the independent agencies contained in the bill.

Mr. President, turning to the drug issue, our cities and towns all cross this country are choking from the grip of drug-related violence. Certainly that is the case here in our Nation's Capital as well as in cities in the Southwest, Northeast, and all across the Midwest. I believe the Federal Government has a responsibility to provide the Federal resources needed to allow our law enforcement agencies to truly wage an all out war on drugs. The bill before this body, contains increased levels of funding for critical drug interdiction and law enforcement activities of the U.S. Customs Service. It also contains increased funding over and above the President's request for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearm's Armed Career Criminal Program; and additional funding for the expanded construction of facilities for the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center to meet the growing demands of the law enforcement community.

For our Federal employees, the bill contains a provision which authorizes the full 3.6-percent cost-of-living adjustment for general schedule Federal employees starting January 1, 1990. This COLA does not apply to Members of Congress, judges, or executive branch personnel above executive level III. Unfortunately, while the bipartisan budget agreement assumed 22 percent absorption for the 1990 COLA, we just did not have the estimated $150 million in additional funding it would cost for that level of absorption. As a result, we have had no choice but to take the same approach as we did in fiscal year 1989 which is to include a provision which applies only to the agencies under our jurisdiction, which calls for full absorption of the pay raise. I understand the burden this places on all Federal agencies, however, until and unless the administration recognizes the need to fully fund the pay raise in its regular budget submissions or through a supplemental, I see no way we can come up with the additional funding required to cover the costs of the pay raise.

For the General Services Administration, we have included sufficient funding in the construction and repairs and alterations accounts to fund those priority projects authorized by the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. These accounts include $54.6 million for new and improved border stations along the United States-Mexico border to facilitate vehicular entry and commercial trade along the border from Texas to California. This is the third year in a row we have provided additional funds for the United States-Mexico Border Improvement Program and we are adding these funds to the $88 plus million that has already been provided to date.

Finally, Mr. President, the bill contains a provision which relates to section 89. We have amended the provision included in the House-passed bill which would have prohibited the implementation or enforcement of section 89. The new section 524 of the bill will indeed eliminate the ability of the Internal Revenue Service to enforce what nearly every Member of Congress knows to be an overly confusing and counterproductive provision of the Tax Code, section 89.

The Senate version of this provision prohibits spending by Treasury or IRS to enforce, or issue regulations binding on the taxpayer with respect to section 89 of the Internal Revenue Code. The House version had inadvertently precluded implementation and enforcement of non-section 89 provisions included in section 1151 of the Tax Reform Act of 1986. Had the Senate not caught this mistake, many employee benefit programs, including cafeteria plans and educational assistance programs, would been very adversely affected. Further, there may have been a great loss of revenues to the Federal Government as IRS would also have been precluded from enforcing those other non-section 89 provisions passed along with section 89 in the section of the Tax Reform Act of 1986.

The Senate version also improves upon the intent of the House language by providing limited authorizations to the Treasury and IRS to provide taxpayer assistance and also training to their own personnel. I believe this change is the most important item in this Senate provision.

Before I yield to my friend from New Mexico, and I want to pay particular thanks to the Senator from New Mexico and other Members of the committee, it has been a pleasure to work on the bill with them, although I would guess we are going to have some difficult issues in the conference.

I want to take this opportunity to express my thanks and appreciation to the staff, my staff, Patty Lynch, Ursula Maurer, and Karen Robb, along with Becky Davies of the minority staff. This would not have been able to be brought to the floor today if these dedicated people had not worked literally all night and all week last week in order to be prepared today.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DASCHLE). The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, last year we produced the first regular Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations Act for the first time in 8 years. We had been acting on continuing resolutions the previous 8 years. Funding for the important day-to-day operations of Government covered in this bill in each of the fiscal years from 1981 through 1988 was covered, as I indicated, by a series of continuing appropriations resolutions. The signing into law last year of the fiscal year 1989 Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government Appropriations Act was historic in that sense. I hope we can repeat that achievement. When we come out of conference, we will be ready to pass again a freestanding bill as contemplated by our appropriations process. Perhaps if we do it 2 years in a row, it will become ordinary and regular as it should be.

Before I give my comments on the substance of this appropriations act, I would like to commend my good friend from Arizona, the chairman of the Treasury appropriations subcommittee, for his hard work and leadership on this bill. He has already thanked the other members of the committee who so generously gave of their time and helped us expedite this matter, and to the staff. I second his commendation which he has indicated to the Senate in the RECORD.

Mr. President, obviously, it is a pleasure to bring before the Senate H.R. 2989, the Treasury, Postal Service, and General Appropriations Act for fiscal year 1990. This bill, as reported by the committee, provides a total of $18.4 billion in appropriations for activities of the U.S. Treasury Department, the U.S. Postal Service, the Executive Office of the President and a number of very important independent agencies, including the General Services Administration and the National Archives and Records Administration.

Of the total funding provided for appropriated programs under the fiscal year 1990 budget resolution, the Appropriations Committee allocated $18.5 billion in budget authority and $18 billion in outlays to the Treasury Subcommittee for the purposes contained in this appropriations bill. The total level of budget authority and outlays associated with this bill is under these 302(b) allocations, both for mandatory and discretionary spending.

The total of $18.5 billion recommended in this bill is also about $6.5 million below the level of the President's request and about $11.2 million below the funding level recommended in the House-passed bill.

It has not been easy to meet these targets and, obviously, we have some different views and different policies that show up in the funding between this bill and the House bill. Thus, we will have to go to conference, and it may be a difficult conference.

For the first time, as the chairman indicated, the committee has been able, following the lead of the budget summit conference, the executive bicameral, bilateral summit, to recommend the total amount of funding requested by the administration for the Internal Revenue Service. This was not easy because this is fast spendout money, and we had to have an additional $348 million in increased funding in order to meet the requirements and requests of the President of the United States to appropriately operate the Internal Revenue Service and collect from those who owe taxes to the United States.

We recognize that need, and we recognize that it was a commitment that the summit imposed upon us, and we are living up to it. It is also critical that IRS sustain and improve services to the American taxpayers and that we move forward on a tax system redesign. We already have that effort underway and it is necessary that we continue it to assure the adequacy of our Nation's tax filing and processing system in the near future. Funding is recommended for these vital IRS reforms and modernization activities.

The bill also places a very high funding priority on those matters that pertain to law enforcement activities and antidrug activities. It recommends nearly $13 million above the level requested by the President for the Law Enforcement Training Center in order to meet the ongoing training requirements of Federal law enforcement agencies.

An increase of $11.6 million is provided above the President's request for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms. This level of funding provides a total of $50,700,000 for the Armed Career Criminal Program, $14.4 million above the current fiscal year funding level. This program is aimed at armed repeat offenders most often involved in illegal narcotics-related activities. This bill also recommends for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms to form five additional task forces to be located in high-crime cities where there is a growing incidence of firearm violations relating to narcotics trafficking. This increase in funding is provided along with adequate funding for the Bureau to continue its important alcohol enforcement and compliance activities.

The committee also has recommended additional funding for the U.S. Customs Service for fiscal year 1990. The committee has provided the $28 million requested by the President for cargo container examination, an initiative aimed at the detection of narcotics and other contraband hidden in commercial shipments entering U.S. ports. This initiative is essential given the increasing trend we have witnessed in the last few years in the use of containers as a cocaine smuggling method. The funding recommended for Customs also includes the additional $3 million requested by the President for enhanced money laundering investigations in fiscal year 1990. We differ with the President in one respect. That is, the increased funding recommended for these antidrug initiatives will not come at the expense of Customs commercial operations activities which facilitates the flow of legitimate cargo across our Nation's borders. As a matter of fact, this subcommittee is very proud of the improvements that have been made to border operations between the United States and Mexico. In 3 or 4 more years, we will have these improvements reach a level of development that will do America proud and enhance and encourage maximum trade between the Republic of Mexico and the United States.

The bill also recommends increased funding for Customs air interdiction which we think is critical in sustaining and improving our continued battle against drug-smuggling aircraft. The surveillance, tracking, and apprehension capabilities which will be funded by the committee's recommendations will allow Customs to carry out its ongoing air interdiction responsiblities and its role under DOD's new plan for the detection and monitoring of the transit of illegal narcotics into the United States.

In addition, the committee recommends an increase of $10 million in the limitation on the availability of deposits in the Customs forfeiture fund in order to provide additional support to State and local law enforcement personnel involved in joint operations with Federal law enforcement people.

For the National Office of Drug Control Policy, the so-called drug czar's office, the committee has recommended the requested $8.5 million increase above the office's current funding level. That was requested by the drug czar, although we have not granted the requested authority for the expenditure of special forfeiture fund balances becoming available at the close of fiscal year 1990. The committee took such action without prejudice. It will consider requests for release of these moneys once the conditions for the expenditure of these funds as required by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 are met.

The funding level recommended by the committee for the Secret Service is roughly $7 million below the level recommended by the President. I would like to point out to my colleagues that this reduction is equal to the amount requested by the President for the consolidation of the Secret Service headquarters building in Washington, DC. Given the pressing funding needs this year and the fact that the committee learned this consolidation would not occur in fiscal year 1990, we have deferred the funding until next year. Thus, when you remove that, we are funding the operation level at the request of the President.

An appropriation of $430 million is recommended for the revenue for foregone payment to the Postal Service in fiscal year 1990, $30 million below the estimate required to maintain all authorized reduced-rate categories of mail at their current subsidized levels.

This savings results from a provision in the bill restricting the use of third-class nonprofit rates for the sole purpose of advertising for-profit goods and services unrelated to the primary purpose of the mailing organization or provided by the members of such organization for whose benefit such mailing privilege was established.

I believe this is justified and if there are any who would like to debate that issue, we think we can supply you with ample evidence that we are closing a significant abuse of the subsidized third-class mail privilege, and those who are using this provision for charity and other purposes need not worry; they are still covered.

Travel packages, insurance, credit cards, and personal computers are a few examples of advertising being subsidized through preferred rates. The result of this is that taxpayers are unintentionally subsidizing commercial enterprises rather than the educational and nonprofit organizations for whose direct benefit the preferred mailing rates were authorized. Nonprofit organizations will continue to receive subsidies for mail essential to their mission. Other mail eligible for reduced or free postage rates—including political advocacy, library, rural newspapers, and other periodicals, and blind and overseas voter mail—will be unaffected by this action.

Funding recommended in the bill for other treasury department activities, for the executive office of the President, and for various independent agencies are consistent with the levels requested by the administration for fiscal year 1990.

I would like to highlight just a few of the general provisions and other recommendations included in this bill. The bill provides for a 3.6-percent increase for all civilian Federal employees effective January 1, 1990. Excluded from this pay increase are Members of Congress and legislative, executive, and judicial branch employees above level III.

AlCl included in the bill is a provision preventing the use of any moneys provided to enforce or issue any regulations binding on the taxpayer concerning any of the provisions of section 1151 of the tax reform act of 1986 which relate to section 89, regarding the application of antidiscrimination rules to various types of employer benefit plans. While this action does not repeal section 89, it provides a one-year moratorium on enforcement of section 89 by the Department of the Treasury and the Internal Revenue Service.

As has been indicated, we found a way in this appropriations bill to send one more strong message about section 89. I see the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin, Senator KASTEN, on the floor. He has been the leader in the Senate trying to make some sense out of this provision called section 89. In fact, he has led the Senate to the brink of repealing it. We cannot repeal it here. It is not within our jurisdiction. But we have regularly, under his leadership and with the support of many Senators, including the Senator from New Mexico, requested that the appropriate committees of jurisdiction either repeal the measure or substantially modify it. So in this bill, as the distinguished chairman indicated, we have as carefully as we could removed all enforcement money from the IRS as it pertains to section 89.

I think we did a good job on that because they can still answer questions; they can still adopt guidelines so long as they are not binding, but they cannot enforce that section. It seems to me that the committees of jurisdiction, with the adoption of this amendment and the other activity on the floor, and what is now becoming more and more evident to everyone, say that section 89, while it purports to be a nondiscrimination provision of the IRS, is indeed a major discriminator against many businesses in this country.

For those who say section 89 was intended to prohibit discrimination, there are many who believe it is going to discriminate against those who need health care because companies will not buy it, and for small businesses that cannot afford it, it would seem to this Senator it is a discrimination of the type we do not want to continue.

There are many other facts that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin is far more familiar with than I, but I do believe it is time once again to send one more strong signal about section 89, that the people of this country who know about it almost overwhelmingly support either its repeal or that it be subjected to major surgery.

With that, I yield the floor and again thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona for his hard work and his cooperation. I hope Senators who have amendments will come to the floor as soon as possible because we would certainly like to, once again, as I indicated in my opening remarks, get a freestanding bill to the President of the United States for this very vital part of the operations of our Government.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, H.R. 2989, the Treasury, Postal Service, and general Government appropriations bill for fiscal year 1990 provides funding for the programs of the Department of the Treasury, including the Customs Service, the Secret Service, the IRS, and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms.

In addition, the bill provides funding for the payment to the Postal Service fund, the various offices within the Executive Office of the President, and certain independent agencies including the General Services Administration, the Office of Personnel Management, and the National Archives.

The bill as recommended by the Committee on Appropriations provides total obligational authority of $18,411,603,000. This represents a decrease of $6,512,000 from the President's request and a decrease of $11,209,000 from the House-passed bill. With respect to the subcommittee 302(b) allocation, the bill as recommended is within both the budget authority and outlay ceilings.

I wish to commend and to thank Mr. DECONCINI, the chairman of the subcommittee and Mr. DOMENICI, the ranking member, for their excellent work in accommodating the priorities of the Senate within the constraints of the budget agreement. Their work has been hard, it has been arduous, and they have performed it well. I also want to thank their colleagues on the subcommittee on both sides of the aisle and the full committee for the cooperation which has been given to Mr. DECONCINI and to Mr. DOMENICI and to me as chairman of the full committee.

The managers have explained in much greater detail the contents of the measures recommended to the Senate. The bill as reported by the Appropriations Committee deserves the support of the Senate.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I am only going to take 1 minute, I say to my friend from Wisconsin.

I failed to recognize the leadership that has been provided both on the floor and in the Appropriations Committee by the distinguished junior Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know if he is on the floor now, but he has been regularly telling the Senate that the armed career criminal program is a very effective program and that it even might be called an anti-drug program because of the close relationship between armed criminality and drugs.

We have this year found money to accommodate his request that we continue to enhance support for it. We went $14.4 million over last year for a total of $50.7 million for the armed career criminal program, which certainly will dramatically increase the scope in the major cities in which it can operate and probably is as effective a $14.4 million increase as we could make anywhere within the drug program of the United States.

I am very pleased to acknowledge his leadership and to have been part of increasing this program's effectiveness in the United States.

I yield the floor.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I would like to focus the attention of my colleagues for a moment on the section 89 provisions of the bill, and begin with thanking and commending the chairman and ranking member, the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from New Mexico, for their help, their support and their leadership in our efforts at repealing section 89.

Over the past 4 months I have repeatedly brought this issue, the issue of section 89, to the floor.

I believe, and I now know, a majority of my colleagues believe section 89 must be repealed. It should not be reformed. It should not be simplified, it should be repealed, and it must be repealed. Section 89 is unwise, section 89 is unworkable, and section 89 is just plain unfair. As the Senator from New Mexico very ably pointed out, it is particularly unfair to small and medium-sized growing businesses. Today the Senate is now poised to take a giant step closer to the outright repeal of section 89.

As was mentioned by both the ranking member and the chairman, included in this appropriations bill is language which effectively bans section 89 during fiscal year 1990. Specifically the language would ban the use of public funds to enforce section 89 or to issue any new regulations which are binding on the taxpayers.

Mr. President, this is a great victory for the advocates of repeal, and a great victory in the fight for Federal policies which truly make affordable health care a reality for America's workers.

It is clearer today than ever before the section 89 should be and will be repealed. This week, I joined with representatives of the Institute for Research on the Economics of Taxation [IRET] in announcing the results of a new study on the impact of section 89 on our Nation's economy. Simply put, the impact is devastating.

The businesses of this Nation will pay more than $4 billion to comply with section 89 this year. Gross national product will fall by $2.6 billion. This reduced level of economic activity will lead to the loss of nearly 90,000 jobs next year alone. And Federal revenues will fall by $800 million next year because of section 89.

Mr. President, this is outrageous. Statistics like these, combined with the frightening stories that are pouring in from the small businesses of America, make the repeal of section 89 an absolute necessity.

We will not repeal section 89 today—but we can take a giant step closer by approving this appropriations bill. This will put a 1-year ban in place, and give us the opportunity to repeal section 89 outright later this year.

We have improved upon similar language which was overwhelmingly adopted by the House of Representatives. We have cleared many hurdles to making this amendment the law of the land, and we have only one hurdle left to jump.

I hope this provision, and the bill, will receive the strong support of the Senate. The small businesses of this Nation deserve no less.

I would like to take just a moment to congratulate and commend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. DECONCINI] for his fine work in bringing the section 89 amendment through the subcommittee. The Senator is a strong supporter of repealing section 89. He has cosponsored S. 350, the section 89 repeal bill, and voted in favor of repeal on the Senate floor.

Mr. DECONCINI. I did vote in favor of repeal, and that vote came on an amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin. He has been a real leader in the fight to repeal section 89.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank my colleague, and I wonder whether we might spell out right here what exactly the amendment would or wouldn't do. It is my understanding that this amendment's language is not exactly the same as the language passed by the House of Representatives. Is that correct?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct. Two very valid concerns were raised about the implications of the House language. The first was that the House amendment was too broad. Instead of simply addressing section 89, the amendment inadvertently reached into other areas of the Tax Code. The second concern was that under the House language, IRS assistance to taxpayers seeking information on section 89 was prohibited. This is something no one wants to happen, and the amendment addresses that.

Mr. KASTEN. I appreciate my colleague's attention to detail in this matter. I agree that these two consequences are ones we do not want and can ill afford. So, other than these two changes, both the House bill and the Senate bill would have exactly the same impact?

Mr. DECONCINI. The only other area that is singled out is section 89—related training activities by IRS employees, which are specifically allowed.

Mr. KASTEN. I can agree with that exception. What would happen to IRS enforcement under this language?

Mr. DECONCINI. It would cease. The IRS could not audit, penalize, or monitor any business during fiscal year 1990.

Mr. KASTEN. And what would happen to the IRS regulations?

Mr. DECONCINI. The IRS could not issue any proposed regulations or final regulations, or any other type of document which would serve the purpose of regulations. In addition, the current regulations would continue to not be binding on the taxpayer during fiscal year 1990.

Mr. KASTEN. So this provision effectively bans regulatory requirements and enforcement authority for fiscal year 1990?

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KASTEN. What about other IRS activities, short of responding to individual inquiries on section 89 or training IRS employees about the provision?

Mr. DECONCINI. They are restricted. The IRS can assist and advise individuals. But the IRS cannot develop or issue any final, temporary or proposed regulations implementing section 89. The IRS cannot enforce section 89. The IRS cannot issue any new notice, announcement, or ruling which is binding on the taxpayer. We have come very close to completely stopping section 89 in its tracks for the next year.

Mr. KASTEN. So what my friend and colleague is saying is that the language before us prohibits the use of public funds by the Department of the Treasury for any purpose pertaining to section 89 which serves to enforce, advance, or further regulate this provision.

Mr. DECONCINI. The Senator is correct. That is exactly what this language does.

Mr. KASTEN. I thank my friend.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the IRET study on section 89 and a list of the groups which have worked for and support this language all be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IRET BRIEFING ON SECTION 89: BAD FOR BUSINESS, BAD FOR WORKERS, AND BAD FOR THE ECONOMY

(By Roy E. Cordato)

Due to its complexities Section 89 will impose compliance costs of over $4 billion in 1990.

It is estimated that Section 89 will add $4 billion to the cost of labor in 1990 and consequently reduce the level of employment by 89,000 jobs.

By increasing the cost of production throughout the economy, Section 89 will result in a loss of $2.6 million in GNP in 1990.

As a result of the losses in employment and output Section 89 will lose $800 million in tax revenues in 1990.

Because salaries cannot be lowered to compensate for any increases in health insurance benefits, low income workers whose wages approach the minimum wage will be the most vulnerable to layoffs as a result of Section 89.

The underlying principle of Section 89, that health insurance benefits should be uniform among employees, ignores differences in people's needs and the realities of labor markets.

Section 89 is the enemy of free choice. The more health insurance options an employer offers his employees, the more he is penalized.

Section 89 amounts to a tax on the provision of health insurance in compensation packages. As a result it may well reduce the availability of health insurance as a component of the compensation package.

IRET ECONOMIC REPORT ON SECTION 89: BAD FOR BUSINESS, BAD FOR WORKERS, AND BAD FOR THE ECONOMY

(By Roy E. Cordato)

Section 89 of the IRS tax code was instituted as part of the Tax Reform Act of 1986. Its stated purpose is to discourage discrimination based on the worker's salary in the provision of employer provided fringe benefits. Virtually all tax deductible fringe benefits will have to go through five qualifying tests. An additional set of tests is applied to health and group term life insurance plans. These compliance requirements intrude heavily into the employer/employee bargaining process and have the potential of being very damaging to economic growth and prosperity. In addition, Section 89 will have the effect of raising the cost to employers of providing health insurance to employees. This may well reduce the amount of employer provided health insurance that is made available, at the very time when there is significant political concern about the number of individuals that are without health insurance coverage.

The direct effects of Section 89 will be felt most strongly with respect to the provision of health insurance. Over the last decade, workers have come to benefit from an invigorating dose of competition and choice with respect to health insurance plans. While most companies once offered their employees one health insurance policy, take it or leave it, now most workers have the opportunity to choose among dozens of options. Workers can now make tradeoffs between higher or lower wages and more or less extensive health care insurance coverage. To a substantial extent they can tailor their compensation packages to their own needs. If they are young and single and at low risk they have the opportunity to take more of their compensation in the form of wages and less in the form of extensive health care insurance coverage. Conversely, if they have a family or are older workers who may be at higher risk, they can make other tradeoffs. Clearly, these kinds of options have helped the average wage earner.

Section 89 threatens to take a good deal of that freedom away by penalizing both employers and employees in workplaces where these kinds of options are available. In order to reduce "employee-benefit discrimination" employers who are found not to be in compliance with Section 89 will have to reduce disparities between lower and higher paid workers with respect to health care coverage that they freely chose. In other words, simply offering insurance plans in a non-discriminatory way is not good enough. If these disparities are not removed, those higher paid workers with more extensive plans will have to pay a tax penalty on a portion of the value of their insurance benefits.

Currently the fate of Section 89 is up in the air. There are several proposals being considered to address the issue. The most drastic is a proposal by Representative John La Falce (D-New York), with over 300 cosigners, to repeal Section 89 entirely. House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski, who until recently has opposed any changes to Section 89, has changed his mind and is proposing changes that would make it easier to comply with, but that do not challenge any of its underlying principles. In the Senate, Finance Committee Chairman Lloyd Bentson (D-Texas) is also proposing a simplification measure. At the present time businesses have to deal with Section 89 as it was originally conceived, and it is not clear which, if any, of these changes will be implemented.

The rules and regulations that must be adhered to in complying with Section 89 are extremely complex. This has meant that compliance will be over $4 billion in 1990.[2]

The first test that a company has to pass is to be sure that the benefit plans that are offered qualify as legitimate plans for the purposes of Section 89. The qualification tests are the easiest to pass but carry the stiffest penalties if they are failed. These tests require that: (1) the benefit plan is in writing, (2) benefit plans are legally enforceable, (3) employees are notified of the benefits, (4) the plan is for the benefit of the employees only, (5) the plan is permanent. If any of these tests are failed the value of the benefits actually received under the plan by any employee, regardless of salary, becomes part of the employee's gross taxable income. For example, if any employee has a serious illness and his health insurance policy makes $50,000 in benefit payments during a year when his insurance plan fails one or more of the qualifications tests, $50,000 will be added to his taxable income. Most nontaxable fringe benefits must pass the qualification tests. These include (but are not limited to) accident and health insurance, group term life insurance, educational assistance programs, dependent care assistance programs, employee discounts, and employer-operated eating facilities.

Health and group term life insurance plans have to meet a series of additional tests designed to determine if they are discriminatory. Three of the tests examine the extent to which all employees are eligible for the plan under consideration (the eligibility tests) and a fourth part pertains to the benefits actually received by the employees (benefits test).

Two of the eligibility tests look at the extent to which higher and lower paid employees are eligible for different plans while the third is meant to discover if the terms of a particular plan is discriminatory. The first two tests are referred to as the 50 percent eligibility test and the 90 percent/50 percent eligibility test. The 50 percent test requires that a minimum of 50 percent of the employees eligible to participate in any given plan must be non-highly compensated. (In most situations a highly compensated employee is someone earning at least $75,000 (indexed) annually.[3]) The 90 percent/50 percent test requires that 90 percent of all non-highly-compensated employees be eligible for benefits that are at least 50 percent as valuable as the most valuable benefit that is available to highly compensated employees. For example, if the most valuable health insurance benefits available to highly compensated employees are worth $4000, then 90 percent of all non-highly compensated employees must be eligible for plans worth at least $2000. The third eligibility test is nonquantitative and is referred to as the "nondiscriminatory terms eligibility test." It is meant to insure that specific benefits in a plan are not offered with only highly compensated employees or some subset of that group in mind. As one report has described it "this requirement is intended to treat as discriminatory a plan that, for example, covers a rare disease that only affects the owner of the business." [4]

The benefits test looks at the distribution of benefits that actually occur within a company. This test requires that the health insurance plans actually chosen by non-highly compensated employees have, on average, a dollar value of at least 75 percent of the average value of the plans chosen by highly compensated employees.[5]

In order to comply with these tests the data base and administrative requirements will be extensive. For larger organizations that have several operations or units under the banner of one company (corporation, partnership, etc.) the first task is to identify the "controlled group." This is the group of business units that must be considered as one for the purposes of Section 89 testing. Not only is a controlled group likely to include subsidiaries of a parent company that are otherwise unrelated to each other in terms of product lines or the labor markets that they must draw from, it can also include companies that are not considered part of the same parent company at all. The formulas for determining controlled groups are based on a percentage of the value of one company's stock that another company might hold.[6] One discussion of these follows:

"Corporation A owns 90 percent of corporation B and 40 percent of corporation C. Corporation B also owns 55 percent of corporation C. [All three corporations] are members of a controlled group." [7]

Once the appropriate controlled group is determined, data must then be collected on all the employees of the group. This includes part time employees working more than 17.5 hours per week, who must be considered in all of the tests described above. In addition to some relatively routine information such as social security number, salary, date hired, etc., this data base must also include sworn statements from employees verifying the coverage that has been selected, whether or not they have dependent family members, and whether the employee or his dependents has health insurance coverage by another employer. Also the precise nature of each employee's insurance benefits must be identified and its dollar value must be determined.[8] After gathering the necessary information on the entire population of employees, all highly compensated employees must be identified and separated out.

The point is that data gathering will be a costly and complicated process for large and small businesses alike. Large and structurally complex business organizations will suffer because of complications that are inherently created by having a large and diverse work force (part time, full time, and leased employees), and a greater number of insurance options. While small businesses' informational requirements will probably be less complex they are likely to have little of the necessary data readily available. The administrative burden of having to hire expensive outside consultants could be substantial and possibly unbearable for many small businesses.

SECTION 89 CURTAILS EMPLOYEES' FREEDOM OF CHOICE

The fundamental question that arises is, do the ends justify the means? The underlying value judgment behind Section 89 is that all workers within a work-place should both be offered and receive the same level of benefits, regardless of their income. In order to achieve this end, both freedom of contract and free choice is sacrificed. Why this sacrifice of freedom is considered worthwhile is not made explicit by the supporters of Section 89.[9]

There is no attempt made at justifying any of the battery of tests outlined above. With respect to the eligibility tests the question that arises is why should similarly valued benefits necessarily be made available to all employees? While differentials in availability are unusual, typically all plans are offered to all full-time employees, there is no reason to view differentials that do arise as being unfair or unjustified. Within a company different employees performing different duties compete in different labor markets. A manufacturing firm that has both management personnel and welders must go searching in separate labor markets for these different employees. In order to attract workers in these markets they need to provide the kinds of compensation packages that the workers in these markets have come to expect and demand as remuneration for their services. If the market requires that different benefits be made available to different workers then this is what will occur. So long as labor markets are free, all labor contracts are voluntary and therefore mutually beneficial to both the employer and the employee. In this setting, it is not apparent why any differentials that arise among benefits that are available to different employees should be considered morally reprehensible.

There is even less justification, moral or otherwise, for the benefits test. The fact is that when free choice is allowed it is unlikely that equality of result will ever be achieved. People make choices based on their own needs and preferences which always differ from one person to another. Policies that force equality of result at the expense of free choice cannot make people better off.

Even it one starts from the perspective of a purely egalitarian ethic, and is generally unconcerned about individual liberties, Section 89 still doesn't make much sense. Its intent is not to ensure that everyone's level of compensation is the same but to equalize one component of everyones compensation package in a given workplace.

In fact, however, the after-tax value of compensation packages to the workers is likely to be unchanged after this "equalizing" process takes place. If lower paid workers are required to take more extensive health insurance coverage, it will be at the expense of money, wages or some other benefits. The issue for the employers is how much it costs them to compensate labor, not what form that compensation takes. It is the worker who is most concerned about the particular composition of the compensation package. The overall value of a worker's services to his employer is determined by how much the worker contributes to the production process. Without an increase in the worker's productivity there is no reason to expect that the total value of his compensation package would be increased. The reverse would be true if higher paid workers had to take less extensive coverage. Their wages or other benefits would have to be increased in order for employers to retain their services. This provision in the tax code neither makes compensation among workers more equitable nor makes workers better off.

Does Section 89 actually help to correct a problem caused by "benefit discrimination?" Lower-paid workers are generally not discriminated against with respect to the health or life insurance plans that they are offered. Employers do not typically only offer higher valued plans to higher-paid workers. If this were the case it could be easily remedied by simply making all plans available to all workers. Under these conditions the ultimate distribution of benefits is primarily the result of free choice. The most menacing aspect of the Section 89 requirements, the benefits test, has little to do with employer discrimination. With respect to benefit packages actually chosen by workers the only discrimination appears to be by the employees themselves, who, in making their free choices, discriminate among insurance plans. But certainly this could not be construed as harmful to anyone. This is the kind of discrimination that is inherent in free choice and that consumers exercise in the market place everyday. If this is the kind of discrimination that Section 89 is attempting to eliminate, then public policy should also be concerned about the fact that lower income people tend to buy more hamburger while wealthier people tend to buy more filet mignon.

IS THERE A HIDDEN AGENDA?

Section 89 does not address either a discrimination problem or an equality problem. The question arises then, what is really behind this section of the tax code? First, Section 89 has officially been scored as a revenue raiser for the government. Our own estimates suggest a revenue loss. Because of large compliance costs, which are all deductible, and a reduction in GNP, which is estimated to be 2.6 billion in 1990, it is estimated that in 1990 the government will lose $800 million as a result of Section 89.

The Joint Tax Committee has estimated that the federal government would gain up to $150 million annually in additional revenues as a result of this provision. This is because many employers are expected to take what might best be called the "non-compliance option." If it is determined ex post by the IRS that a company is not in compliance with Section 89's eligibility and benefits tests, the company's higher paid employees who have higher-valued plans will be taxed on the portion of those benefits that is considered to be above average. Even though it is likely that employers, in order to retain these workers, would have to increase salaries to compensate for the added tax burden it may be less expensive for an employer to do this than to bear the administrative costs associated with strict compliance. Interestingly enough, even if Section 89 really would raise revenue, it would only do so to the extent that it is not complied with.

The fact is that the tax penalty that would fall on some upper income workers as a result of this provision is simply a tax increase disguised as social policy. Section 89 is a back door approach to expanding the tax base. Those individuals whose taxable incomes are increased simply because their personal circumstances require more extensive health insurance benefits will be the unfortunate victims of this tax grab.

Section 89 might also be a less than straight forward attempt at implementing a mandated health insurance program similar to that proposed by Sen. Edward Kennedy and endorsed by former Democratic presidential candidate Michael Dukakis. To the extent that Section 89 achieves this goal it would have the same adverse consequences for workers and the economy.

As stated above, part time employees working more than 17.5 hours per week are included in the work force for purposes of Section 89 testing. This means that many part-time employees, who typically are not covered by health insurance, may have to be enrolled in the same plans as full-time workers. This could impose real hardships on these workers. First, it would create an incentive for employers to offer part time employment that entails less than 17.5 hours of work per week. Workers who desire less than full time employment but more than just a few hours a week may have to piece together their incomes from several different sources. Those workers who remain working part time but more than 17.5 hours per week will probably have to trade off lower cash wages in exchange for the health insurance benefits. Since most people who work at part time jobs do so for the extra cash, not for the benefits, this kind of trade off would clearly make them worse off.

What is ironic though is that Section 89 could actually lead to results that are at odds with the goals of those who are attempting to extend health care coverage to a greater number of people. Section 89 makes the provision of health care insurance by employers more costly. In other words it penalizes employers who provide health care insurance as part of their compensation packages. This means that some small employers that are currently providing health insurance may decide, after factoring in Section 89 compliance costs, that it is simply too costly to continue the policy. In addition, new businesses starting up that otherwise would have provided health insurance to their employees, may decide not to. Section 89 could actually lead to an increase in the number of Americans without health insurance. What is fortunate is that this result could give greater impetus to the legislative drive for mandated health insurance, ultimately burdening employers, employees, and the economy with both the costs of Section 89 and a mandated health insurance program.[10]

CONSEQUENCES FOR THE ECONOMY

Most directly, Section 89 will increase the cost of labor in the economy. Our estimates are that it will increase compensation costs in the year 1990 by $4 billion. Workers whose pay package composition is changed in order to pass the benefits test will need to have the dollar value of their total compensation package increased simply to keep them as well off as they were before the change. This is because the new mix of health insurance benefits, cash wages, and other benefits will not be the one that is most preferred from the point of view of the employee. If it were, he would have freely chosen it in the absence of Section 89. This means that from the employee's point of view the total compensation package is made less valuable if its overall dollar value remains unchanged. For the employer, then, the total cost of the affected compensation packages will have to increase in order to keep the employees as satisfied as they would be in the absence of the Section 89 requirements.

The additional administrative costs of this provision will be associated strictly with labor inputs into the production process, and the larger the work force the more burdensome the administrative costs will be. Survey results indicate that Section 89 compliance requirements will raise private sector labor costs by about .2 percent, on the average. This is equivalent to hiking payroll taxes by nearly $3⅗ billion in 1990. For this reason Section 89 will create new biases against the use of labor in general and will discourage the expansion of existing work forces. Our study estimates that Section 89 will lead to a loss of 89,000 jobs in 1990.

As with any increase in labor costs, Section 89 will reduce labor inputs relative to capital in the production process, leading to a decrease in capital's productivity. This, in turn, will cause a rise in its cost. The end result will be an overall increase in the cost of production economy-wide. So while the estimated tax drain on the economy is relatively low, the actual cost to the economy in terms of lost output could be much greater than this amount. For workers it will mean slower job creation rates and higher unemployment rates.

Ironically the employment effects of section 89 will have their greatest impact on lower-paid workers, with the most vulnerable being those working at or near the minimum wage. Most of these workers are part time employees and those just starting out in entry level positions. The reason for this is that there exists little or no downward flexility in their wages.

Those lower paid workers who are forced to take a greater proportion of their compensation in the form of health insurance will probably have to have some other part of their compensation package reduced. With minimum wage workers or those working for wages that are close to the minimum, a reduction in wages is ruled out. If they do not have other non-pecuniary forms of compensation that are more flexible, the chances that they will lose their jobs completely are increased. For those very low wage workers, the effects of Section 89 would be comparable to an increase in the minimum wage. There would be no incentive for the employer to retain any workers whose productivity does not justify the increase in the value of the compensation package that Section 89 would require. In this sense it is Section 89 itself and not any action on the part of the employers that discriminates against lower paid workers.

Section 89 should not be viewed in isolation. It is one of a number of straws that, collectively, could have a disastrous impact on the camel's back. In this case the camel is the U.S. economy in general and its workers in particular. Public policy makers seem to be going out of their way to make the use labor as costly as possible. Social Security taxes are scheduled to increase to 15.3 percent in 1990. Congress recently passed a plant closing notification law that could significantly increase labor costs.[11] Proposals are also being considered that would require employers to provide health insurance and parental leave benefits to all employees.[12] In addition it is possible that an increase in the minimum wage could also be passed this year. The point is that while all of this legislation is perceived to be pro-labor, it would add billions of dollars to labor costs and the cost of production in general. Section 89 is part of a total package that could significantly raise unemployment rates in this country.

In addition to its effects on labor and capital costs, Section 89 could also have an effect on the competitive process among firms and therefore on the overall efficiency of productive activity. It is likely that Section 89 will intrude into the competitive process in an industry by impinging disproportionately on different businesses. It will penalize companies that offer their employees greater choice with respect to health insurance options. It will also penalize companies who, by no fault of their own, have employees that happen to choose health insurance benefits in such a way that the Section 89 benefit tests are not met. These effects will raise the costs of production disproportionately for different businesses within an industry, which will give an undeserved competitive advantage to some and reduce competition overall. Any reduction in competition translates into a reduction in economic efficiency and productivity, and higher prices for consumers.

The negative economic consequences of Section 89 could be severe. AS mentioned above, it could mean a reduction in GNP of over $2.6 billion in 1990. It will cause increases in the cost of both labor and capital; in 1990 it will result in 89,000 fewer jobs than would otherwise have been filled. Its combined effects will be to retard overall economic growth which will make all segments of the economy—businesses, workers and consumers—worse off.

CONCLUSION

As social policy, Section 89 of the IRS Code is misguided. It presumably is meant to improve living standards for lower paid workers, while its likely effects are exactly the opposite. Its stated purpose is to eliminate so-called "benefit discrimination," when in reality is is difficult to see where or why such discrimination is a serious problem.

Section 89 will make workers in all income categories worse off by increasing the cost of labor and production in general, and by restricting workers's freedom to choose the compensation package that best fits their needs. Unfortunately, as is very often the case with such policies, the hardships will be born most heavily by those that the policy is supposed to help. Section 89 is a mistaken solution to a nonproblem. It calls for repeal. It is to be hoped that Congress will hear that call.

Unless otherwise specified, all estimates of the effects of Section 89 mentioned in this paper have been derived from these survey results.

[5] There is a fourth test and that could substitute for the eligibility and benefits test outlined here. This is referred to as the 80% alternative test. If a plan actually benefits 80% of the non-highly compensated employees then it will be in compliance with Section 89. This would only benefit small companies with few or no insurance benefit options. "[I]f your company provides 'free' individual and family Blue Cross/Blue Shield health insurance coverage for every full- and part-time employee, you do not offer an HMO option, no employee is permitted to waive coverage, and there are no discriminatory plan terms, your company's health insurance would satisfy the alternative 80% coverage test . . ." [8] For purposes of Section 89 every permutation of a health insurance option must be evaluated as a separate plan. For example if a company has one plan that offers a zero deductible and a positive deductible option and that also offers a single and family plan, it must be viewed as four separate plans.

Mr. SPECTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SPECTER. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I have just a few remarks to make on the pending bill. I wish to compliment the distinguished Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI and the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, Senator DOMENICI on an outstanding bill. In addition, I want to compliment the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee for bringing these bills to the floor so promptly.

We all know of the problems of the past years of having continuing resolutions and their detrimental effects on the operation of the Government. We remember vividly President Reagan's State of the Union speech in 1988 where he held the continuing resolution on the desk, had it poised delicately, and perhaps haphazardly. It appeared it was going to fall from the desk. I was sitting a few feet from him, and was very worried, but I think he had some underpinning to make sure it did not fall.

But that enormous continuing resolution was a very dramatic display about the importance of passing appropriations bills one at a time and on time.

He talked about the line-item veto, a measure that I think is important. Hopefully, we will have it perhaps in the form where a simple majority of the Congress—that is just a 51-percent majority of the Congress, which is never simple—could override a veto on these legislative matters. But until that comes, it is very important that we pass the appropriations bills one at a time, and pass them early. To do that the activities of the committee, the chairman, and the subcommittee chairman and ranking member are very important, as exemplified here today as we proceed on that goal. My own efforts on the Appropriations Committee are directed toward the same line.

Mr. President, I wanted to comment specifically, to thank and compliment the chairman and the ranking member for the allocations provided in this bill for the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms who enforce my armed career criminal bill.

Mr. President, let me state very briefly what has been accomplished under the armed career criminal bill, and compliment the chairman and the ranking committee members for their efforts to have unique task forces created in a number of cities, including the city of Philadelphia.

There presently is an ongoing task force in the city of Philadelphia created in the Commerce, State, Justice appropriations bill and the necessary appropriations bill in 1986. That task force began its operations in 1988.

The Department of Justice delayed implementing this congressional directive until last year. The Department of Justice thought better of the importance of having the task force during the recent confirmation process for the Deputy Attorney General. But as a result of the political process that task force is now in operation. The task force has extra FBI agents, extra agents from the DEA, from the Immigration Service, BATF and extra U.S. attorneys.

It is proceeding very, very successfully in rounding up the major drug sellers and the major drug dealers in Philadelphia. These new BATF task forces however, provide a different emphasis—to put the violent armed career criminal behind bars using the mandatory sentencing provision of my Armed Career Criminal Act. The experimental task force recently concluded in the District of Columbia has proven enormously successful. I, therefore, look forward to its implementation in Philadelphia's working in conjunction with violent traffickers project mentioned previously.

Philadelphia, as a major city, has enormous problems with drug traffickers and violent criminals, candidly as do all of America's major cities, smaller towns, and the rural areas.

I have had intimate familiarity with the issue, having been district attorney in Philadelphia. I am glad to see the bill today again emphasizing the importance of the task force concept for Philadelphia and other cities.

I again thank and compliment the managers of the bill for their allocations and support of the armed career criminal bill.

Mr. President, the armed career criminal bill is a measure which this Senator first introduced in 1981. It was passed in 1982 but it was the subject of a veto on the larger crime package by President Reagan in January 1983. But it was brought back into law in the Omnibus Crime Control Act of 1984.

That bill provides that where some one is a career criminal, is found as having committed three or more major offenses, and that individual is found in the possession of a firearm, that individual is subject to prosecution in the Federal court as a career criminal, and subject to a mandatory sentence of 15 years to life.

This is a very important substantive measure, Mr. President, being directed against a critical criminal in our society, the career criminal. The statistics show that these career criminals commit up to 700 crimes a year, one or two or three a day. The estimates are that as many as 70 percent of the serious crimes in this country are committed by the career criminals.

This bill is directed right at the heart of the critical aspect of the violent crime problem in this country, and the drug sellers. The National Commission on Criminal Justice standards and goals estimated in 1972—a Commission on which I serve—that if we could put 200,000 career criminals in jail, we could reduce violent crime in this country by 50 percent. That is an objective that I think we ought to work toward.

My own estimate today is that we have perhaps as many as 400,000 career criminals at work in this country, some 17 years later. I think a very important goal is to add 200,000 jailcells in this country to house these career criminals.

But in today's bill, Mr. President, there has been a significant increase in the funding in the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms—an increase of some $13½ million to fund additional positions.

This funding, Mr. President, has gone from $2.5 million in 1987 to $17.8 million in 1988, to $36.3 million in 1989, to $50.8 million for fiscal year 1990.

I am pleased to say that I have worked closely with the chairman, Senator DECONCINI, and the ranking member, Senator DOMENICI, in working these figures through in collaboration with the Treasury Department.

These agents go right after the people who are in possession of firearms, and target the armed career criminals.

As stated earlier, there is a task force at work right now in Washingtom, DC, a special task force, which is having excellent results. The statistics show a high degree of prosecutions and a very high conviction rate. With unanimous consent, Mr. President, I will have those statistics in at the conclusion of my statement. I will not take the time of the Senate to recite them now.

Mr. SPECTER. I point out, Mr. President, that the Armed Career Criminal Act provides substantial additional leverage for local prosecutors. One of the original ideas in the legislation involves the problem that I had as district attorney of Philadelphia, when I had some 500 career criminals to prosecute. These criminals would dance their way through criminal courts in Philadelphia, getting continuances, and when ultimately convicted—if the witnesses lived long enough and could remember what happened—they would receive light sentences.

The thought on my mind was, if we can take this group of 500, for example, in Philadelphia, and take five of them into the Federal courts where they would be subject to immediate trial, within 90 days, and in some appropriate cases preventive detention, and where they have the benefit of the individual judge calendar, they could not make the same excuse repetitively for continuances. There they would receive sentences of 15 years to life. As for the other 495 on the DA's books, the prosecutor for the city and county of Philadelphia, those other 495 would know who was next. As a result, there would be a great many guilty pleas induced. While there would not be sentences of 15 years to life in the State courts, they would be 5 to 10 years, perhaps 6 to 12 or perhaps 4 to 8. There also would be a very substantial leveraging factor to get those cases concluded and get serious criminals off the street.

I am pleased to see that in the 5 years that the bill has been in operation, that it has been very successful, and I am just delighted with the increased funding which is being given to this Federal agency to carry this work forward, especially in light of the fact that the drug problem is so intimately connected with these armed career criminals. The more support along this line with the additional jail space, the better off we are on a very significant step against violent crime and drug-related crime in this country.

In addition, Mr. President, I wish to thank the members of the subcommittee for their assistance in including language in the bill restoring equity to the city of Easton, PA.

Due to geo-political boundaries, the city of Easton has not been in a position to include in its population count the metropolitan area which the city serves, giving the city a limited population for statistical purposes. The Office of Management and Budget [OMB] ruled that only cities with one-third the population of the largest city in a certain area be included in that area's metropolitan statistical area [MSA] title. The OMB ruled in 1983 that the title of the Lehigh Valley's MSA was inaccurate and found it necessary to remove the "E" from the title "A-B-C". While the move seemed, at the time, a natural adjustment under the rules of OMB, it was not seen and is not seen by residents of Easton as a fair evaluation of their metropolitan area. The city of Easton always has been recognized as a significant part of the Lehigh Valley and, therefore, should be included in the MSA title, contrary to Federal regulations.

While the the city of Easton has not and will not suffer direct losses due to the inaccurate title of its MSA, the city fears that the omission of its name in the MSA will diminish its visibility to businesses and other economic development projects. In addition, the local resident's deep desire to be recognized in this way is testament to the enormous pride they have in their community and their desire to be recognized as an equal partner in the Lehigh Valley.

In response to this situation, I joined Senator HEINZ on January 31, 1989, in sponsoring S. 291, a bill to require the Director of Office of Management and Budget to include a reference to Easton in the official title of the MSA of which it is a part. In addition, Congressman DON RITTER also reintroduced legislation (H.R. 1211) to address this matter. The language contained in these bills is the thrust of the provision contained in this bill today. I understand that the House of Representatives also included this language in its Treasury appropriations bill.

Mr. President, I commend my colleagues for recognition of these important provisions, and urge them to join in support of passage of this bill.

I thank the Chair and the managers and yield the floor.

EXHIBIT 1

ARMED CRIMINAL ENFORCEMENT STUDY [ACES], WASHINGTON, DC

Reporting period: March 1, 1989, to May 1, 1989.—

119 criminal investigations initiated involving firearms and narcotics traffickers.

103 individuals arrested for firearms and narcotics violations.

7 922(g) cases recommended for prosecution (felon in possession of firearm).

15 924(c) cases recommended for prosecution (use of firearm during commission of drug trafficking crime).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I want to thank the Senator from Pennsylvania for his comments and leadership in this armed career criminal effort that he has been at for a long time. I joined with him early in supporting this effort, and having been also a prosecutor, I understand the importance of this program.

I want the Record to also show my compliments to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. KASTEN] for his remarks on section 89. He brought this amendment to the Senator from New Mexico and myself. We reviewed it and worked carefully with him to construct something that would achieve something we all want—that no funds can be used for the enforcement of the section of the Tax Code in fiscal year 1990. So, I am most grateful to him.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I will be brief because I do not want to delay final consideration of this bill or any opportunity to get to the other bills so that we can complete action today. I also want to express my appreciation to the Senator from Arizona for the language he has in the bill on section 89.

There has been no issue, other than catastrophic health insurance perhaps, that I have heard more about from my constituents in Mississippi this year—particularly small business men and women—than section 89.

I have felt very strongly since the beginning of the year when I started looking at the ramifications of section 89 that it should be repealed. And I introduce my own legislation, S. 350, to accomplish that goal.

This provision, which did not take effect until January 1989, was intended to ensure that businesses did not discriminate in favor of highly compensated employees. Unfortunately, it is accomplishing the opposite.

From what the small business community in my State has relayed to me, many employers have taken action to drop employee health insurance in order to avoid costly compliance with section 89.

I support the intent of Congress in discouraging discrimination in employer-sponsored benefit plans. However, as small businesses became aware of the complex specifics of section 89, most are saying that it is simply too much trouble and too expensive, and are terminating all health benefit coverage. This law established to prevent discrimination is proving to be a law that could destroy most small employee medical plans, and leave many low-salaried employees with absolutely no medical insurance.

Implementation of section 89 is a significant problem for employers. Small employers are receiving quotes of a minimum of $1,000 for initial evaluations; larger firms are spending $50,000 and up to make a best guess at what section 89 compliance will require.

Section 89 does not protect or increase employee health coverage. Section 89 puts employee health plans at risk. This law will decrease the number of employees covered by employer-sponsored health insurance, and will likely decrease the extent of coverage for employees.

Even with some of the minor changes made to section 89 in the Technical and Miscellaneous Revenue Act of 1988, the provision remains a complex nightmare, especially for small businesses.

So I think the language in this legislation that prohibits enforcement, while we decide what to so with section 89, was the right thing to do.

I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee and the ranking member, and I commend them for what they did on section 89.

I would like to make a couple points.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I say to my good friend from Mississippi that I personally appreciate his remarks, but I do want to comment about his activity with reference to section 89. Obviously, in my remarks I indicated that the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin had taken the lead, but I also alluded to many Senators who have been actively seeking either repeal or substantial surgery on that statute, and now that you have come to the floor, I want to include your name as one specifically who has been active in trying to fix that very, very unfair and counterproductive statute.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the Senator from New Mexico. Just a couple of questions—maybe I can direct them to the chairman—about the bill itself.

I believe your indications have been that this bill is actually under the President's budget request. Is that right? How does it relate to the President's budget request for the Treasury, Postal Service and general Government appropriation bill?

Mr. DECONCINI. Just a minute, and I will get the exact figure for the Senator from Mississippi; $151 million below the President's request.

Mr. LOTT. And just one other question about——

Mr. DECONCINI. I stand corrected. It is not $151 million; $6.5 million, I believe.

Mr. DOMENICI. $6.5 million.

Mr. DECONCINI. It is $6,512,000; the Senator from New Mexico points that out; it is below the President's level.

Mr. LOTT. As I understand it, it is over last year's expenditure level by perhaps as much as a couple of billion dollars; is that correct? What is the explanation for that?

Mr. DECONCINI. Would you repeat the question?

Mr. LOTT. How much is it over last year's expenditures? While there are certainly some very worthwhile departments and agencies in this legislation, there are a lot of them that I have a great deal concern about, particularly the IRS. I can appreciate the customs and drug enforcement activities, but I have problems when we have bills year after year that increase expenditures over the previous year.

Mr. DECONCINI. It is $2.365 billion over last year's level and $348 million of that alone is for the Internal Revenue Service, that we were asked to provide under the terms of the bipartisan budget agreement, to raise additional revenues to meet the Gramm-Rudman targets. And I have had difficulty with that for years, I can assure the Senator from Mississippi, adding money to IRS to collect money.

Mr. LOTT. I do not believe that works.

Mr. DECONCINI. I do not think it works either, but some others here made that agreement. It also has enhancements for the cost of living pay raise of 3.9 percent for all Federal employees here—that is the budget and the civil service retirement—mandatory programs, increases such as the civil service retirement.

Mr. LOTT. Well, I will not prolong this, but I want to make note of the fact that it is approximately $2 billion over last year's expenditure level. I would like to encourage the chairman of this subcommittee to see if we cannot keep these bills from increasing every year. And I particularly want to express my frustration at the ever-increasing fund for the Internal Revenue Service. Some of the antics and actions of that agency in recent times, I think, are not every commendable.

I do not believe that every time we give them more funds, we necessarily get more revenue. I do not know that I want to encourage that anyway. I will not prolong this discussion. But I did want to make note of the fact that the bill is over last year's level. I do not think it should be. I know the Senators are doing the best they can.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LOTT. Yes.

Mr. SYMMS. I just want to say to the Senator that I, too, want to ask him a question. When was it that we first voted this year, early in the year—and compliment the committee—but we had a vote, and the Senator from Mississippi and myself had an amendment here on the floor where we had set up a tree that could not be amended to address section 89. It was earlier this year. I think it might have been on the first budget resolution. Is that correct?

The Senator from New Mexico was nodding his head. I think that is right. I say to the Senator that I join with him and others to thank this committee for continuing to keep pushing these spikes in section 89, and eventually we hope to get a good enough chop to cut the head off that rattlesnake, and return that back to the way the law was previously or, if not returned to the way it was previously, to a major overhaul of section 89 that will not be so obnoxious and will cause some of our constitutents to lose some of their insurance coverage.

That is really what the goal of the committee is, I believe. I appreciate the efforts of the chairman and ranking member to see that is in this bill because it has carried through on the original votes. The first vote here in the Senate I believe was on my amendment on a sense-of-the-Senate resolution and now we actually have teeth in it, and I appreciate it.

Mr. LOTT. I thank the Senator from Idaho, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, while the Senator from Mississippi is still on the floor, let me just make two observations with reference to his comments made to the committee and to the Senate.

First, I want the Senator to know that while the number is correct, that this bill is $6.5 million less than the President's request, the Senator should know that that does not mean that in a number of items we may not have cut the President's request, and in a number of items we may have increased the President's request.

We are only giving the Senator the sum total, in the budget sense. That is where the $6.5 million under comes from.

Second, I know the distinguished Senator from Mississippi wants the budget of the United States to be reduced and the deficit to be eliminated. And I do not want to talk budget talk. But I would like the Senator to know that if he wants this appropriations bill significantly reduced then he and/or others must change the entitlement programs that we have to fund.

In other words, we get an allocation of money and a certain portion of it we just have to fund because it is the law of the land. And nearly $2 billion of the increase in this bill is that: Payments that the Government owes to cover its share of Federal employees retirement, life insurance, and health benefit costs. If you take that out of this I believe this is one of the smallest increases for the discretionary appropriated accounts that we have had in years and in any of the appropriations bills. I will just give you the numbers quickly: $8.812 billion versus $9.379 billion.

Of that, to live up to the budget summit, we had to put nearly $200 million in IRS to comply with the summit's requirement that we fully fund their enforcement mechanism to raise an additional $468 million in revenues in fiscal year 1990.

So those are the more comparable numbers from the standpoint of us being able to do something to achieve what I think is our mutual goal of reducing the expenditures of the Government and at the bare minimum, keeping their increase to significantly less than the history over the past 15 or 20 years.

I thank him for the questions and his observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I wonder while my friend is on the floor if I may address him.

First, I want to compliment Senator DECONCINI and Senator DOMENICI on their work on this bill, particularly funding for law enforcement and Customs. They have provided significant increases in those areas. I also compliment my friend from Mississippi. I think he makes some very good points.

I believe the total amount of money—and maybe my friend from New Mexico will answer this question—but I think the total amount of money in the bill increases from $16 billion to $18 billion? It is almost a $2 billion increase; is that correct?

Mr. DOMENICI. $2.3 billion; is that not right, Mr. President?

Mr. NICKLES. $2.3 billion, so my colleague is talking about a 15- or 16-percent increase overall. It is a pretty significant increase.

But I also think we are funding a lot of areas that a lot of us think are quite important, Customs and drug enforcement and some other areas. So I compliment you for that.

I also wish to compliment both the chairman and ranking member and also Senator KASTEN for the work they have done on section 89. I personally would like to go further. I would like to repeal section 89 and have been tempted to offer an amendment to do so. But certainly there are restrictions on section 89. I believe the Senator from Wisconsin [Senator KASTEN] has mentioned those as well as the chairman of the committee and the ranking member.

I think that is very important because there are a lot of businesses today that are very, very concerned about complying with section 89. It is such a very intrusive, very expensive provision that a lot of businesses are even contemplating reducing if not eliminating some of their fringe packages, whether it be health and accident or pensions or others.

So I compliment them for their work on it and for the work on the committee.

AMENDMENT NO. 693

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. NICKLES] proposes an amendment numbered 693.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 50, line 25, strike the word "approval," and insert in lien thereof the following: "approval; Provided, That this section shall take effect one day after enactment; Provided further, That the Senate backs the Constitutional power of the President to make foreign policy.".

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, may we see the amendment? I was going to object to not reading the amendment but the Chair already had ruled. I have not seen a copy of the amendment.

Mr. NICKLES. I will get a copy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma retains the floor.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is recognized.

AMENDMENT NO. 694 TO AMENDMENT NO. 693

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I send a second-degree amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS] proposes an amendment numbered 694 to amendment numbered 693.

Strike all after the word "that" in line 5 of the amendment, and insert the following:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no person who is a retired regular officer of the military service, who was graduated from the U.S. Naval Academy, who has served in Vietnam, and who has been awarded the Silver Star, the Bronze Star, and two Purple Hearts, shall be considered as holding an office of the United States for purposes of section 2071(b) of title 18 of the United States Code. Upon enactment, this provision will become effective as of May 1, 1989."

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second?

There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, Col. Oliver North was recently convicted for violating section 2071(b) of title 18 of the United States Code. That provision reads:

Whoever, having the custody of any [government] record, proceeding, map, book, document, paper, or other thing, willfully and unlawfully conceals, destroys the same, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than three years, or both; and shall forfeit his office and be disqualified from holding any office under the United States.

Mr. President, because this statute requires that the person forfeit his office, the General Accounting Office has determined that Colonel North must forfeit his full retirement pay. In a letter dated July 31, 1989, the General Counsel concluded that after Colonel North's pay is withheld, he can sue in Federal court for a "conclusive determination of whether he is entitled to continue to be paid as a retired regular officer of the Marine Corps."

Mr. President, there is question as to whether Colonel North's pension should be forfeited by the provisions of 2071(b). In fact, the Judge Advocate General of the Navy concluded that Colonel North does not hold an office within the meaning of subsection 2071(b) and therefore should not forfeit his retirement pension. He made two arguments to back up his conclusion.

First, he argued that the purpose of forfeiture provisions, like the one in section 2071(b), is not punitive. It is to protect the public from any further official misconduct. Since retired officers have no official duties, there is no reason to include them within the scope of the forfeiture provisions.

Second, neither reserve military officers nor civilian officials are considered as holding an office of the United States after they retire. Consequently, they would not forfeit their retirement pay as a result of a conviction of section 2071(b). To read section 2071(b) such that a retired regular officer must forefeit his or her retired pay creates an anomaly that is unfair and obviously not intended by Congress.

Mr. President, I am sure that the distinguished majority leader, in opposing this amendment, will argue that the we have already taken action on this issue when we adopted his second degree amendment to the DOD Authorization bill. I do not agree that that is the case. And the record will show that I advised my friend that I intended to pursue this matter; I feel that Ollie North deserves it.

The majority leader's amendment directed the Judiciary Committee to consider various questions regarding when a retired regular officer of a military service is considered as holding an office of the United States after he retires. This is a question that we should probably resolve; however, I believe that the Senate should have an opportunity to vote on the limited question of whether Colonel North should receive his pension.

Furthermore, as the distinguished majority leader knows, his amendment has no effect unless and until the DOD Authorization bill is enacted into law. So it is perfectly appropriate to give the Senate an opportunity to vote on the specific question of whether Colonel North should receive his pension.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is necessary to leave this issue to the Federal courts to decide. We should make it clear today that Colonel North will receive his pension.

The amendment I will offer provides that Colonel North does not hold an office for the purposes of section 2071(c). Consequently, he will not forfeit his retirement pay as a result of his conviction under that provision.

Colonel North served honorably and admirably during the Vietnam War; he was awarded the Bronze Star, the Silver Star, and two Purple Hearts for his service. There is no question in my mind that he is entitled to his military pension, and I think the Senate should have an opportunity to vote on that question.

In summary, Ollie North was recently convicted for violating section 2071(b) of title 18 of the United States Code. The Chair will recall that Colonel North was convicted on three counts, all of which he had acknowledged at the outset of the Iran-Contra hearings. So, $40 million of the taxpayers' money has been spent to convict Ollie North of charges, including one that he accepted a security fence at a time that terrorists were threatening to kill his family.

I do not know about the distinguished Presiding Officer, but if terrorists were threatening my family, I would take a security fence any way I could get it, from anybody I could get it, if I thought it would help protect my family.

Forty million dollars spent to not only prosecute but also persecute Ollie North. I have not taken a poll, but I think the vast majority of the American people resent it. Certainly, I do.

The statute referred to in the amendment requires that the person forfeit his office. According to the General Accounting Office, that means Colonel North must forfeit his full retirement pay.

Where did he earn that retirement pay? By fighting for his country, by leading troops into combat in Vietnam, where he was awarded a Bronze Star, a Silver Star, and two Purple Hearts.

In any case, in a letter dated July 31 of this year the General Counsel concluded that after Colonel North's pay is withheld, he can do what? He can sue in Federal court for a conclusive determination of whether he is entitled to continue to be paid as a retired regular officer of the Marine Corps.

So what are they going to do? They take away this lieutenant colonel's pay—retirement pay—and say: "You can go ahead and raise money and spend your own money fighting it in the Federal courts."

I reiterate for the purposes of emphasis, $40 million of the taxpayer's money has been used thus far to persecute Ollie North, and I think enough is enough. If ever a man earned his retirement pay, he did.

But there is some dispute as to whether Colonel North's pension should be forefeited by the provisions of 2071(b). In fact, the Judge Advocate General of the Navy concluded that Colonel North does not hold an office within the meaning of subsection 2071(b) and therefore should not forfeit his retirement pension.

The Judge Advocate General made two arguments in support of his position, and I think he is right on both of them.

Let me read them.

First, he argued that the purpose of forefeiture provisions, such as the one in section 2071(b), is not punitive. It is to protect the public from any further official misconduct.

Well, Mr. President, since retired Marine officers, Army officers, or any other military officers who are retired have no official duties, there is no reason to include them within the scope of the forfeiture provisions.

Second, the Judge Advocate General points out that neither reserve military officers nor civilian officials are considered as holding an office of the United States after they retire. Of course they are not. No more so than the president of General Motors when he retires. He is not active with General Motors. Consequently, neither a reserve military officer nor a civilian official would be required to forefeit their retirement pay as a result of a conviction under section 2071(b).

To read 2071(b) to interpret that a retired regular officer must forfeit his or her retired pay creates an anomaly that is unfair and obviously not intended by Congress.

But what do we have? Ollie North is told, "You are not going to get your money, and you can go to Federal court and plead your case and you may get it."

So here we go again with the persecution of Ollie North.

The other night we adopted a second-degree amendment, offered by the distinguished majority leader [Mr. MITCHELL], to the DOD authorization bill.

Let us go back and recall why that amendment in the second-degree was offered. It was offered to head off precisely this amendment. The majority leader was fully within his rights. He did not violate the rules. He did not bend the rules. He simply did not want Senators to have to vote on the question of whether Ollie North will be denied the pension that he earned in Vietnam and throughout his career in the Marine Corps.

Senators do not want to touch a hot subject like that. They do not want the people back home asking, "Why didn't you support Ollie?" So we put it off by requiring another one of those studies. Sometime in the fall, the Judiciary Committee, on top of everything else it is supposed to do, is directed to hold hearings and come back and say yea or nay as to whether there ought to be legislation regarding Colonel North's pension.

I say, let us do it now, let us do it clean, let us vote it up or down.

Mr. President, more specifically, the majority leader's amendment directed the Judiciary Committee to consider various questions regarding when a retired regular officer of a military service is considered as holding an office of the United States after he retires.

Oh, what a momentous question.

This is a question we ought to resolve and resolve right now without further delay, without further persecuting Colonel North. I believe that the Senate should have an opportunity to vote on the limited question offered by my pending second-degree amendment. That question is whether Colonel North and his family, a delightful family, should receive his pension.

Furthermore, as the distinguished majority leader knows, his amendment, adopted the other night to circumvent the offering of the amendment that I just sent to the desk, has no effect whatsoever until the DOD authorization bill is enacted into law, and that may never happen. There is a lot of question about that bill.

So I say that it is absolutely appropriate to give the Senate this opportunity to vote on the specific question of whether Colonel North should receive his pension.

I certainly do not believe that this Congress ought to put its thumbs in its ears and say, "Let the Federal courts decide." Lord only knows how long that would take.

We should take a position. So the amendment that I have at the desk provides that Colonel North does not hold an office, which he does not, for the purpose of section 2071(b) of title 18, United States Code. Consequently, this amendment provides that Colonel North will not forfeit his retirement pay as a result of the persecution that has gone on for a year or more.

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I will say this and I will finish, and I thank the Senator.

Ollie North, regardless of what you think about this whole Iran-Contra thing, and it was loaded with political implications from the very beginning, Colonel North served his country honorably. He served admirably in Vietnam. He was awarded the Bronze Star, the Silver Star, two Purple Hearts for his service. A lot of the pygmies who criticize Ollie North never saw a day when they were willing to lay down their lives for their country.

There is no question in this Senator's mind that Ollie North and his family are entitled to the military pension which he earned and earned honorably. I think the Senate should have an opportunity to vote on it.

I yield to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. First, I wish to compliment the Senator on his amendment and ask him a question.

So the effect of his amendment will basically be to restore immediately, or upon passage and enactment of this act, Ollie North's pension.

Mr. HELMS. Absolutely, the Senator is correct. I thank him.

Mr. NICKLES. If we waited on the amendment that was added to the DOD bill, we would wait. That did not restore it. It said basically that the committee would report it out at some future date and maybe at that time Congress would get around to enacting or maybe Congress would be out of session, so he might not have his pension restored.

Mr. HELMS. That is correct. The Senator is correct.

Mr. NICKLES. I compliment the Senator, my friend from North Carolina on the amendment and I would hope that it would be passed today. I thank him.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, let me say to my friend from North Carolina I think Oliver North was a hero and once a hero, I suspect you are always a hero. He was a hero because he served in Vietnam, and as I understand served this country exceptionally well. He was decorated, served in combat, and was literally willing to die for his Nation, I do not know what more you can ask of any citizen or any man or women. That is where Oliver North made his heroism known to the world.

When Lieutenant Colonel North was assigned to the National Security Council's staff, he went there as a military detailee and he went there as an advisor and an operative to do whatever he was told to do.

Now, we know from history and from the court decision in the Iran-Contra hearings here that this man violated the law. Many disagree with that decision as many may disagree with other public officials who have been convicted or have been the subject of oversight by congressional committees. But in this case, a jury, a jury of his peers, before a district court here in Washington, DC, found him guilty. As I recollect, he was found guilty of three felony counts.

Yes, we can argue there were 12 to 13 counts and only 3 came back guilty. Nevertheless, Colonel North is no different than any other citizen. If you are found guilty, you have the right to appeal. If you are found guilty, you lose certain benefits, and that is what has happened here to Colonel North. It is too bad, and I do not say that with any glee, that he has lost his pension. It would not bother me so much if his pension continued, but the law is clear, in my judgment, and a person who disagrees with that ruling that he has lost his pension can take that to court. That is what Oliver North, I understand, is in the process of doing and that is what he should do. But in my opinion, it is not for us to be the court here. To me the Senator's amendment is ill-conceived at this time. I understand the politics of it. Who does not want to vote on a controversial amendment dealing with Oliver North's pension. I can tell my colleagues I do not have any qualms at all in voting in opposition to this amendment because, in my judgment, it is not an issue that we ought to decide here.

The public, through the judicial system, has ruled he is guilty of felonies. Those are subject to appeal, but that is the verdict. The law is very clear that he loses his benefits. Should we change the law for Oliver North because he was a hero in Vietnam? I do not think we should, any more than we should change the law for anybody else, who has elected of his own free will to take some action that ends up in a criminal indictment, a jury trial and results in criminal felonies. It was a case where charges were being lodged against him, but a verdict came in holding him guilty of those charges.

Mr. President, I have no problem with this amendment. If we want to vote on it, it is up to the leadership to decide how they want to proceed today. It seems to me if we really want to take care of the business of the Government, we ought to pass this bill. We ought to pass this bill because it deals with the Customs Service; it deals with the IRS; it deals with a number of agencies that affect the Federal retirement system. We ought to move on. The Senator from North Carolina, or the Senator from Idaho, already has a commitment that the Judiciary Committee is going to look at this matter. I believe the date was October 1—I cannot remember. I was not here that evening—that they would report back legislation or a resolution to be voted on. The Senator has every right to offer amendments, but it seems to me it is very counterproductive.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I have no better friend in the Senate than Senator DECONCINI. He knows of my affection for him and my admiration. We have worked together on so many things, and he did the best he could with the argument against the amendment. He almost persuaded me, except the law is not clear. That is the point. It is not clear about Ollie North's entitlement to his pension. As a matter of fact, common sense, I believe, will tell us that a retired official, whether it be the Marine Corps or General Motors or Jones drugstore, is retired. He holds no official position. That is the point. I believe the General Accounting Office, or whoever it was, almost got a hernia straining on the decision.

But, in any case, let me point out one thing. Maybe the Senator from Arizona can correct me if I am not right, but the 1988 Anti-Drug Abuse Amendments Act contains a provision prohibiting convicted drug dealers from receiving Federal benefits; however, and get this, "Federal benefits" is defined to exclude, I quote, "any retirement, welfare, social security, health, disability, veterans benefit, public housing, or other similar benefit." In other words, a convicted drug dealer can receive all of those benefits.

So what we are saying is that an exemption is being given to convicted drug dealers so they can keep their Federal benefits, whatever they may be. But in the case of Ollie North, lieutenant colonel retired, we say, "Oh, no, you cannot have it." His lovely wife, Betsy, and the children cannot have the retirement pay that Ollie North literally bled for while he earned it in Vietnam. I say that is a travesty. Mr. President, I rest the case. If there is no further comment, I suggest we go to a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I understand the argument of the Senator from North Carolina. The facts are simply this. The GAO issued a ruling. In a statute of 1982, it says that if a person shreds documents who is an officer of the U.S. Government that they lose that office. Now here we have the technical point the Senator from North Carolina wants to hang his hat on, and that is that he is now retired and he is no longer an officeholder, so to speak, because he is a retired officeholder. Well, I think the argument is very clear that the acts which Mr. North was convicted of occurred while he was on active duty and while he was an officer in the Marines. There is no question about that.

The Senator makes a good point. Let us have somebody decide this. He wants us to rule on this point of law. It seems to me what the leadership arranged here with the Senator from Idaho was most proper, and that is to refer to the Judiciary Committee and have the Judiciary Committee review it and report out their findings subject to amendment.

If somebody does not agree then, at least we have had the chance to see, but in the meantime to attempt to force this on the bill, to me the argument is clear that shredding documents under the 1982 statute subjects you to losing your office.

Mr. North was convicted of shredding those documents while he was in office, vis-a-vis the ruling that his retirement is tied to his office-holding position. He does not come from General Motors or the private sector; he comes from the U.S. Government. A retired person in the U.S. Government obviously stems that retirement from the service of the Government and the fact that he was convicted during the time that he was on active duty for shredding documents and violations of the statute.

I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. NICKLES. If the Senator will yield for a second, I wonder, and I do not know this answer, but were the Members of Congress who were convicted in regard to the Abscam scandal lose their pensions? We had one Senator and a few Congressmen.

Mr. DECONCINI. I do not know, but had they been convicted of shredding Government documents, they would have lost their pension, in my opinion. I do not know if they did.

Mr. NICKLES. I wonder if staff is aware whether or not they lost their pension.

Mr. DECONCINI. I can find out. I do not recall any of those individuals being convicted of shredding documents which, in my judgment, would have made the 1982 statute applicable. That is why Oliver North is in the situation he is in; it is because of that statute.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Might I ask Chairman DECONCINI a question? I heard your answer to Senator NICKLES' question. Might the Senator enlighten me, knowing his expertise in this area, is it the shredding of documents or is it the felony conviction that does this to a Federal official?

Mr. DECONCINI. I have to tell my friend from New Mexico, I do not consider myself an expert in this area. I have been advised that there is a 1982 statute that shredding documents is the crime that would take away your retirement benefits or the office that you hold. Oliver North was convicted of that. One of the three felony counts was shredding documents in violation of that statute, vis-a-vis the GAO ruling that this was applicable to his retirement.

I am sorry I cannot give the Senator a real expert opinion. I can only tell him the little bit that I know, and I know a little bit of knowledge is dangerous, sometimes so are little amendments.

Mr. SYMMS. Will the Senator yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DECONCINI. I will yield.

Mr. SYMMS. There is a question asked, I understood. I happened to talk to a former Member of Congress who was convicted and actually had to spend some time in prison, and he informed me yesterday that not only he but all of the Members that he knows of that were Members of Congress that have actually served time in prison have received their pensions during the time that they were in prison, during and since.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMMS. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. DOMENICI. I assume that those to whom the Senator is referring were convicted of felonies, is that correct, in the typical American definition of felony, more than 1 year imprisonment?

Mr. SYMMS. That is correct. I do not want to name names but former Members of this body and several from the other body, that has happened in the last 10 years in relation to the Abscam case.

Mr. DECONCINI. Will the Senator yield in that case?

Mr. DOMENICI. I yield the floor.

Mr. DECONCINI. I remember those cases. Does the Senator from Idaho recall any of them were for shredding Government documents, any of the felony convictions?

Mr. SYMMS. I do not believe they were. I believe they were in relationship to Abscam.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator.

I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I would point out that the forfeiture provision in section 2071(b) of the United States Code is not punitive. It is there like so many other forfeiture provisions, so the person involved cannot commit the same offense again while he holds office. You have a divided opinion on whether Colonel North continues to hold office after his retirement. In fact, the Judge Advocate General, chief legal officer of the Navy, has made the point that the Attorney General formally has expressed the opinion that the purpose of forfeiture provisions such as the one in subsection 2071(b) is not punishment, which is otherwise provided for, but protection of the public from any further official misconduct.

Now, arguably retired officers have no official duties. Of course they do not. Therefore, there is no reason to include them within the scope of the forfeiture provisions of section 2071(b) and similar statutes.

That is not Jesse Helms talking. That is the Judge Advocate General of the Navy. I think he is right. I think common sense says he is right. Furthermore, the Judge Advocate General pointed out that neither reserve military officers nor civilian officials are considered as still holding an office under the United States after they retire. A reading of subsection 2071(b) that requires retired regular officers who violated it to forfeit their retirement pay but impose no such requirement on retired reservists of civilians is sufficiently anomalous to raise doubt as to whether Congress intended that result.

I go back to my original premise. Enough is enough. Is this Senate seriously going to stand by and say to Ollie North and his lovely wife Betsy and their children, it does not matter that Ollie served in Vietnam and shed blood for this country, received two Purple Hearts, a Bronze Star and a Silver Star? We are not going to let you have the pension that Ollie earned. I just cannot believe that the Senate of the United States will take that position.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HELMS. I will be delighted to yield to my friend.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator this question. Is not the issue before us today not whether or not he was convicted of whatever crime and however the court ruled—that is a separate issue——

Mr. HELMS. That is right.

Mr. SYMMS. The question is whether or not the Senate of the United States believes that Oliver North should get his pension?

Mr. HELMS. Correct.

Mr. SYMMS. That is the issue.

Mr. HELMS. That is the issue.

Mr. SYMMS. Really there is not much else to discuss. Either you want him to get his pension or you do not.

Mr. HELMS. One way or another, whether it is an up or down vote, tabling motion or whatever, the Senators under the parliamentary situation are going to take a stand.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, if I could just ask further, does the Senator from North Carolina believe that sooner or later the American people will view this as an outrage, that somehow our Government has become so insensitive that we could allow something like this to go on, that sooner or later he will get that pension?

Mr. HELMS. Let me put it this way, Mr. President. I confess and acknowledge that Ollie North is my friend. About 4 weeks ago I took him to North Carolina with me to appear before the Veterans of Foreign Wars convention in Greensboro, NC. I will tell you that if I were a Senator who had voted to deny Ollie North his pension, I would have to take a bodyguard before I went before the VFW in North Carolina. I cannot speak for all of the people of the United States, I do not speak for anybody except myself, but I am convinced, based on my travel around the country and certainly around my State, that the people feel very strongly that officials of the U.S. Congress can go home after various deeds and they still get their thousands upon thousands of dollars in pensions every year. What is more outrageous is that convicted drug dealers, under the Anti-Drug Abuse Amendment Act of 1988, have a special exemption so that they will not forfeit Federal benefits. But this Senate is not willing to even vote on the question of whether Colonel North deserves his pension. That is the question, I say to the Senator from Idaho. I guess, to use a North Carolina expression, it is time to put up or shut up.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, the exchange gets better and better as we have some time to discuss this. I think it is important for the public to know who Oliver North is. I do not know much about him, but I know he came to Congress and stood up and admitted that he had told lies to the Congress of the United States. He stood up—I saw him—and said he would do anything, he would go stand on his head in the corner if the President of the United States told him to do it.

I think it is important to know both sides of this fine man that we are talking about because he has served our country well, and I give him the credit for it. But he is also a convicted felon as of today and we want to try to sugar-coat this a little bit on the basis that this is just kind of a technical situation we are talking about as to his retirement.

We are talking about a convicted felon. We are talking about whether or not he is going to be able to continue to receive taxpayers' retirement funds. I think the public is really interested to know. That is why I do not object to having a vote. But somebody else is going to make this decision here today, I can see, but I know where I am going to come down.

I am not going to vote to give taxpayers' money and a pension retirement that is paid by the individual as well as the Government to a convicted felon. We have a process in this country. That process is to go through the appeals court. If Oliver North's conviction is appealed and reversed, well and good. That is not what we have before us today. We have more than just a technical sugar coating of a retirement decision. We have before us a man who has been convicted of three felonies, I believe, if I am correct. And he faces that for a good part of his life.

Oliver North has been out in Arizona. He had some people come out there and see him. He charges a lot of money for speaking engagements. But the time he came out prior to the November election, or was going to come out—he could not get anybody to pay his fee out there. They just refused to do it because he was coming out there for somebody, who I knew quite well, who happened to be running for the same office I was running for. So North was out there to campaign, not to exonerate himself or to plead his case. He was out there to campaign to make money for himself.

I think it is important that we know who Oliver North is, and if we are going to get into a debate here for several days, that may be the case. A lot of things are going to come out about Oliver North, and this Senator is going to tell some of them.

I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Th Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I rise because I have some questions for the Senator from North Carolina about this particular amendment. Will the Senator from North Carolina answer some questions that I have about this particular amendment, what it is?

Mr. HELMS. I'll be glad to answer any questions of my distinguished friend from Nebraska.

Mr. KERREY. I picked up in part over the television set your discussion of this amendment. I do not understand exactly what it is that you are trying to accomplish. Can you explain it to me? I assume in the language, you have drawn it as to benefit one individual in this case, Oliver North. You are upset with the administrative judgment at this point and would like to accelerate this in order to benefit one individual.

Mr. HELMS. That is essentially it. There are other aspects to it. I am not asking any more for Ollie North than what this Senate already approved with respect to convicted drug dealers. I do not think Ollie North ought to be treated more harshly than drug dealers. Did I answer the Senator's question?

Mr. KERREY. Not exactly. You have gone into an argument for it. I am trying to figure out exactly what you are trying to accomplish. If I am correct, this specifically directs that Oliver North's pension will be immediately restored and no further administrative action will be taken, and no review given up—to just have an act of Congress to declare that it be restored; is that essentially what the Senator is saying?

Mr. HELMS. That is essentially it. The Secretary of the Navy said that Ollie North is not an official of the United States Government.

Mr. KERREY. The Senator from North Carolina has raised, it seems to me, a principle. I am sure I am not an exception.

I have received requests from individuals to intervene between them and their Government on many instances, individuals who have been denied SSI benefits, for example, who feel as if they have been treated unfairly, who, if they do not receive the SSI benefit, will have to go on welfare and will find themselves in a perilous position with life. I have been asked to intervene for a good friend of mine who lost both arms as a consequence of being in Vietnam. VA is saying to him, "We are going to deny you benefits that are afforded a double leg amputee, because the rules say that you must have lost both limbs below and not above." I have been asked to intervene on behalf of that individual. Am I now to bring before the Congress an exception for him? Is that what this action is doing, Senator?

When I get a request where an individual has been unjustly treated, particularly when their life is in greater danger—which is more than I suspect Lieutenant Colonel North's is—am I now to come on the floor of the Senate and ask for a narrow law change?

Mr. HELMS. Sure.

Mr. KERREY. Just to protect that individual?

Mr. HELMS. Sure, if you feel strongly about it.

Mr. KERREY. No, Senator, I disagree with the Senator from North Carolina. I do not think that would be in fact what we should be doing here, attempting to come and intervene in every administrative case, making narrow exceptions for individuals, making narrow changes in the law for individuals. We know what is at stake here. "Are you for or are you against," is the story, "the pension for Oliver North." I am against it.

Just so there can be no doubt, just so there can be no doubt, in case this does not come to a vote and the Senator from North Carolina wonders where I stand on this issue, I am against it.

I am also against the principle of coming to the floor of the U.S. Senate when we have an individual who has been, we think, unfairly treated, and passing a law to take care of them. I will ask every single Senator, what is the Senator's answer going to be for that individual who has been denied workman's compensation benefits, and you believe unfairly; SSI benefits, you believe unfairly; veterans compensation, and you believe unfairly; any other kind of compensation, and you believe unfairly; will he bring an amendment and try to describe their military history, maybe some of their bodily features, without naming them, and draw it narrow enough so only they will qualify? I suspect you will not.

I suspect there will not be a single Senator upon that principle who would come to the floor of the U.S. Senate and do the same thing. I object to it on principle. I would not vote for it anyway, even if I accepted the principle, which I do not. I would vote against it anyway.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS Let me say to my friend from Nebraska that I respect him, because he does not pussyfoot on issues. He stated his case unequivocally, and I admire him for that. It is this business of avoiding votes, avoiding taking a position, that I can't understand. I admire the Senator from Nebraska for his willingness to state a position. I respect him for it.

Now, Mr. President, let me read into the RECORD a letter signed by the chairman and vice chairman of the Select Committee on Ethics of the U.S. Senate, dated May 23, 1989. I am going to omit the name of the recipient Senator.

DEAR SENATOR: This is in response to your May 2, 1989, letter. You are correct in believing that former Members who have been convicted of felonies or ethical misconduct remain eligible to receive full pensions. You ask for an explanation of the current policy and whether or not a revision in the policies regulating Members' pensions might be in order.

The applicable statute (5 USC 8311, et. seq.) was originally enacted in 1954 in an attempt to remove the pension of Alger Hiss and is known as the "Hiss Act". As enacted, PL 83-769 prohibits the payment of government pensions to Members of Congress and others who are convicted of federal or District of Columbia felony charges, perjury, or who plead the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination in response to questions about their services as employees or officers of the federal government, any previous or current relationships with any foreign government, or past or present memberships in the Communist Party.

In 1961, Congress amended the Act restricting denial of pensions to persons charged with violations of national security, largely because it concluded that the Hiss

Act had caused a hardship on many for acts that Congress deemed to be relatively minor offenses. Today, the statute provides for denial of federal pensions for persons charged with espionage, sabotage, and national security-related crimes.

Attached you will find a copy of H.R. 1703, which is pending in the House. If enacted, this bill would deny annuity benefits to Members who are convicted of any felonies under state or federal law. We have also attached additional material from the Congressional Research Service that deals with this issue. We hope you might find it of interest.

With Best Wishes,
Cordially,

HOWELL HEFLIN,
Chairman.
WARREN B. RUDMAN,
Vice Chairman.

I have read the letter into the RECORD. So it is there.

I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McCAIN. Mr. President, I have not intended to speak on this issue. I feel that it is a very personal judgment that needs to be made by each and every Senator. My reluctance to discuss this issue on the floor of the Senate is directly related to the fact that I have had my own service during the Vietnam war, I have had my own experience, none of which I have ever referred to in any way on the floor of this Senate, nor do I intend to because my job is as a United States Senator from the State of Arizona, not as a Vietnam veteran.

I feel somewhat compelled to come over here because of the statements that were just made by the Senator from Nebraska.

First of all, I would like to say that if the Senator from Nebraska has a constituent who has been deprived of his benefits because of the fact of a technicality in rules and regulations of the Veterans Administration which disallows him disability payments, because he is missing both arms, and the Senator from Nebraska is unwilling to take up his case, I will take up the case. I will take it to the floor of the Senate. I will take it to the President of the United States. I will take it anywhere because it is my obligation as it is the obligation of every Senator here to make sure that our disabled veterans receive benefits that they deserve and, Mr. President, it is our obligation to overcome any technicalities in the law which may deprive these men and women who have served our country with dedication and sacrifice.

So, I reject the argument that we are making an exception in this or in any other case, if a Member of this body believes that a person has earned benefits serving this Nation in defense of its freedom or someone else's.

Mr. President, I happen to be of the personal view that Oliver North served with distinction, with courage in combat and I believe that the recognition that was bestowed on him by the President of the United States in the form of various awards and medals are ample testimony to that.

I also happen to believe that because of these facts that Oliver North, therefore, deserves a pension for his service in combat for the United States Marine Corps for this Nation.

But I also wish to say I do not intend to impose my views on any other Member of this body because it is a personal decision that needs to be made with each individual Senator, evaluating the facts as they see it.

Mr. President, I do not think it is fair for us to invoke the memories of the Vietnam war or the Iran-Contra situation in isolation one from the other.

I urge Members of this body to judge Oliver North's service to this country and judge what is taking place to him in his case before the courts of this country.

I happen to come down in the belief that his service to this country has earned him his penison from the American people, but I also urge my colleagues who differ on this issue to view the issue in the context of his entire service and all of the events that took place and let us not go around excoriating people's reputation and tearing each other's character down or motivations on this issue.

Let us make it in as objective a way as we possibly can and certainly let us not use any of our service or lack of service to our country as a factor in this debate, because I happen to believe that every one of the 100 Members of this body has served his or her country and served with honor and distinction, and there are many ways of serving their country.

Let us not use our service or lack of service in any war or any combat or any conflict as a basis for making this decision.

I urge my colleagues to raise the level of this debate on an individual judgment as to the merits of Oliver North's service to this country or as to how they feel that his involvement in the Iran-Contra affair detracted from that overall record of service to this country.

I happen to be of the view that he deserves his pension, but I urge my colleagues to judge this on an objective basis and not on any basis of whether I or any other individual has served this country in any way, shape, or form.

I thank the President, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont is recognized.

ON DISASTER ASSISTANCE LEGISLATION (S. 1429)

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, late last night, Senate and House negotiators reached agreement on disaster relief legislation.

This morning, the House approved the package. Now it is our turn to give this bill final approval and send it to the President for his signature.

This is a fair, fiscally sound bill. It includes three critical elements which I have insisted on from the time the Agriculture Committee first began working on disaster relief legislation.

First, it treats all farmers fairly and equitably. Drought and disaster do not discriminate among farmers. Neither does this bill. It provides relief to all farmers who have suffered significant losses due to bad weather.

All farmers who show a demonstrated loss will receive the same payment rate—65 percent of the applicable target price, loan rate or average market price.

When the Agriculture Committee first considered disaster relief, some argued that we should only help those who farm program crops and participate in Federal commodities programs.

The committee and the Senate have rejected that view. And the bill before the Senate today rejects that view. Both program and nonprogram crop growers are eligible for assistance at the same payment rate.

We cannot pit the interests of farmers in one State against those of other States. We cannot pit the interests of those who farm one type of crop against those who grow other types of crops.

The surest way for rural America to lose is for us to pit one part of rural America against another. Rural America can only win when we work together.

Second, this package is fiscally sound and budget neutral. It provides assistance only to the extent of the funds available.

Third, we have completed action in record time. The bill will be on the President's desk before we adjourn for the August recess. We have administration support and a commitment that the relief will be on its way to farmers before the fall planting season.

I would like to take a moment and thank all the members of the Agriculture Committee for their support and willingness to work long hours to put this package together. I would also like to thank Senator LUGAR for his bipartisan efforts in working to develop a package that is fair to all farmers.

Farming is part of the basic fabric of American life.

When our farmers suffer catastrophic loss—whether it is due to drought, flood or other disastrous weather—we must keep our pact with those who work the land. We must help our neighbors in their hour of need.

That is what we will be doing today when we pass this bill and send it to the President.

Mr. President, I want to thank Senators on both sides of the aisle, especially the members of the Senate Agriculture Committee. The Hastings trial continued all week and five of us on the Agriculture Committee, myself included, are jurors on the Hastings trial. Because we were in the Hastings trial all day long, much of our committee work had to be completed during the very early morning or at night.

Look what we did. We passed the disaster relief bill, then brought it back from the other body and passed the conference report. We passed a rural development bill, the first time in 9 years the U.S. Senate has passed a major rural development bill. Yesterday, we passed major legislation on child nutrition and WIC reauthorization.

All three of these things are important legislation.

CHILD NUTRITION AND WIC REAUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1989

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the child nutrition and WIC Reauthorization Act passed yesterday by the Senate tells our Nation's children—the 24 million students who receive school lunches and the 1.8 million infants and children who participate in the Women, Infants, and Children Program—that we care about their future.

We face a tragedy and a shame in this country—the wealthiest, most powerful Nation in the world—when one out of five children live in poverty and one out of five children are hungry.

Mr. President, each day thousands of American infants are born underweight and malnourished. Many are put in intensive hospital care. For too many babies this is a difficult beginning of a hard life, a life defined by poor diet, illness and learning difficulties. From the very first day these children are robbed of a healthy start in life.

Despite the economic gains of the 1980's we have an ever-increasing number of children who live in poverty; one out of every five children in this country is born in poverty. This bill is designed to help those children.

In my own State of Vermont, a large number of our schools close down during the summer. With no lunch program, many low-income children end up going hungry. When the summer recess bell sounds it does not just say to them "school is out." It says, "Now you go hungry."

Less than one percent of these children in Vermont have been reached by the summer feeding program in the past. Now that will change. If this bill is enacted by the other body, it will allow private, nonprofit groups—churches, community action groups and others—to participate in a summer food program.

This bill fulfills a commitment I made last year. Last year, the House of Representatives removed a provision allowing nonprofit groups to run a lunch program in the summer. I said then we would again try to enact this provision. Mr. President, this Senate bill has now put it back again. The House has agreed to do the same.

Another provision of the bill extends a successful Vermont idea to the rest of the Nation. The bill provides a competitive bidding requirement, allowing the national WIC program to work as well as the Vermont model.

In my State, our children are our future. I am proud to have passed a bill that will give many of them the food and nutrition they need to get a good start in life. A good breakfast to help our students learn better at school and grow into healthier adults. With the summer program, they will have good nutrition all year round. The United States is blessed. We have a chance to do for our own people what many other nations do not. Many nations around the globe are unable to feed their people. Around the globe, we see images of starving children and starving adults.

Then we look at the United States—the only major power in the world able to grow and produce enough food to feed itself and still feed many other countries. And we have to ask ourselves: Why, when we are able to spend billions of dollars to store the surplus food, children go hungry?

Mr. President, one out of every five children in this country faces that hunger because they face poverty. One out of every five children in this country is born into poverty. We have to ask: What do we give them, what kind of heritage?

The bill strengthens WIC. WIC gives poor youngsters a chance. It helps feed poor mothers, infants and children and teaches them about nutrition and health care.

It offers supplemental food, nutrition education and health-care assessments to those who need it.

In short, WIC works, It is widely praised as one of the Nation's most effective social programs. Study after study shows that WIC helps ensure larger, healthier babies from birth on through the first vulnerable years.

Study after study shows each WIC dollar saving multiple dollars in health-care and hospitalization costs.

Unfortunately, WIC reaches only half of all eligible poor women and children. The other half—over three million nutritionally at-risk women and children—remain vulnerable because WIC is not fully funded. This underfunding does not make social or economic sense.

Republicans and Democrats alike have called for expanding the reach of WIC. Last fall, former presidents Gerald Ford and Jimmy Carter both recommended full funding for WIC over the next several years.

President Bush has also praised WIC, calling for increased spending "so that women, infants and children in need receive the care they need."

I am proud that this bill not only extends WIC, but includes an important provision that will allow WIC to serve up to 80,000 more children each year at no additional cost to the taxpayer.

This provision is but one of the many important advances incorporated in this bill.

Mr. President, the legislation is bipartisan. It passed without objection on the Senate floor.

It keeps with my own conviction that hunger is not a partisan issue, but is rather a moral challenge.

This bill reflects the hard work and commitment of both Republicans and Democrats on the Agriculture, Nutrition and Forestry Committee.

In addition to expanding the Summer Food Program, the bill also expands the School Breakfast Program.

Almost 90 percent of school lunch participants are children from low-income families. However, over 50,000 schools that participate in the School Lunch Program do not participate in the Breakfast Program. The school participation rates are especially low in rural areas.

The bill will provide incentives—financial assistance—to cover expenses in starting a Breakfast Program.

The costs of expanding both of these programs is $13 million next year and about $50 million over the next 3 years. However, spending this money on needy poor children is money well spent.

The legislation also mandates that the Department shall conduct Summer Food Service Programs for homeless children under the age of 6 in emergency shelters.

These are children who are too young to go to school and receive school lunches. This pilot project to feed these homeless children is an excellent idea, and was recommended to us by the U.S. Catholic Conference. I thank them for their great idea.

There are many other important provisions in this 80-page bill that improve our child nutrition programs. I have touched on the major provisions.

On behalf of America's children, I thank the Senate for its swift and decisive action.

COMMENDING THE STAFF OF THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE, NUTRITION, AND FORESTRY

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I wish to commend the staff of the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

Over the past several months the Agriculture Committee staff has put in thousands of hours of work which culminated the passage of three pieces of major legislation this week: disaster assistance; rural development; and the reauthorization of Child Nutrition and WIC programs.

The Disaster Assistance Act of 1989 was the result of extremely hard work and negotiation. I would particularly like to commend our chief economist Bob Young and senior counsel Bill Gillon for their outstanding efforts. Bob's professionalism and mathematical genius helped us to construct cost estimates that facilitated difficult negotiations and allowed us to move forward. Bill's legal expertise and creative talents were put to work as he drafted the legislation and amendments under extreme time pressure, enabling us to finish the bill in both the Senate and House today.

Many other staff members worked on the disaster assistance legislation that I would like to mention. Margaret Huessy, our new professional staff member, originally with the House Agriculture Committee, professional staff member Kathleen Merrigan, economist Tom Hebert, and legislative staff assistant Patricia Coates spent many hours working on key legislative issues in the bill. Their dedication and ability to work under time constraints made the passage of this important legislation possible.

The Rural Partnerships Act passed on Wednesday was the first major piece of rural development legislation passed in the Senate in nearly a decade. It would not have been possible without the diligent and professional effort of many staff members.

I would particularly like to mention deputy chief counsel Ed Barron and senior counsel Carolyn Brickey who spent endless hours developing consensus on difficult policy issues and writing this important legislation that made up the Rural Partnerships Act. Legislative staff assistant Laura Madden's continuing research and writing efforts greatly contributed to the final product. Our rural communities can thank the team effort of these staffers for the legislation intended to reverse economic decline in rural communities.

The Child Nutrition and WIC Program reauthorization also passed last night. Janet Breslin, our deputy staff director coordinated staff efforts that led to the development of a bill cosponsored by every member of the Agriculture Committee. Janet Breslin, Ed Barron, and Laura Madden spent many long hours working on this legislation in addition to other pending legislation. Their outstanding efforts will mean that the nutritional needs of America's needy children will continue to be met.

Our new communications director Jon Haber and deputy press secretary Patrick Collins also did a magnificent job under pressure. Racing against deadlines, they drafted statements and kept the press and public informed about legislation as it moved through the committee and Congress.

Chief clerk Chris Sarcone, Betsy Paul, and Cynthia Neuwalder were outstanding as they managed a busy schedule of hearings and markups at the full committee and subcommittee levels. Their superb organizational skills have kept the committee on track on all of our legislation.

Administrative clerk Bob Sturm coordinated the support staff efforts of Shannon Shinn, Patrick Rita, Mary Kinzer, Marc Carrel, and Valerie Callands who worked long hours cheerfully and diligently. Special thanks to Don Finch, the committee printer for keeping the paperwork of the committee activity in order. I am sure that without the truly outstanding efforts of the support staff, it would have been impossible for the Senate to complete the committee's legislation before our recess.

In addition to the legislation passed this week, the committee continues to develop legislation and maintain oversight on a range of significant issues. Special counsel Ken Ackerman has been invaluable in our ongoing investigation of futures markets as the committee works on reauthorization of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Rich Guldin, from the Forest Service, professional staff member Tom Tuchman, and legislative fellow Jim Phippard have been instrumental in moving the environmental and forestry agenda of the committee forward. I am confident that their superb efforts will result in significant legislation for the Senate to consider later this year.

I wish to mention the minority staff director, Chuck Conner, who was appointed by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, Mr. LUGAR. He, along with the entire minority staff have worked with us on all aspects of legislation passed this week and deserve equal recognition. The Agriculture Committee continues to operate in a bipartisan fashion in large part because of the professionalism and cooperation of the minority staff.

Finally, I would like to commend staff director Chuck Riemenschneider and chief counsel Jim Cubie. Both Chuck and Jim are close personal friends of mine and are outstanding professional colleagues. People like Chuck and Jim embody the best of what we have here in the Senate. They are models of expertise, professionalism and selflessness.

Chuck has helped many members understand often confusing and technical legislation. His broad understanding of agricultural policy and leadership of the committee staff have directly contributed to the success of the committee's legislation.

Many times, even at 2 o'clock in the morning when he was still at his desk, I was impressed over and over again by his tireless professionalism.

Jim's legal experience with a wide range of Government programs was instrumental in developing landmark rural development legislation. His expertise in legal matters and Senate procedure helped produce high quality legislation that moved quickly through the Senate.

In summary, Mr. President, in the past several weeks the staff of the Senate Agriculture Committee has done an outstanding job. They have worked endless hours, often into the wee hours of the morning and into the weekends. Their professionalism and dedication to the committee have resulted in major legislation that will ultimately benefit all Americans. Farmers whose crops were devastated due to adverse weather conditions will receive aid. Deteriorating rural communities can look forward to improved education, health, water quality, and business. We have also reinstated and streamlined nutrition legislation so that it reaches more children.

I am proud to enter into the RECORD today the names of those who have served the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry and the entire Senate so well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junor Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee is far too modest.

The fact is, we have just accomplished the equivalent of two grand slams because of the extremely strong leadership of the chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee.

Back in January, I asked the majority leader to create a rural development task froce so that we could create legislation to enhance development in the rural areas of this country, the very parts of the country that are suffering the most.

At that time I urged the majority leader to make the chairman of the Agriculture Committee the chairman of that task force, so that we would have an opportunity to have rural development legislation come to this floor and pass.

The majority leader follwoed that course and the chairman of the Agriculture Committee provided extraordinary leadership.

I do not think may people in this Chamber would have believed it was possible to get rural development legislation passed by the August break. But it was done and it was done because of the exceptional work of Chairman LEAHY and his staff.

Like Chairman LEAHY, I want to salute the staff who did an extraordinary job and put in an exceptional effort.

Mr. President, it was not only the rural development bill that came out of the leadership of the chairman of the Agriculture Committee. It was also a drought bill that went a long way from where we started out 5 weeks ago.

Some will recall that some of the membership wanted to limit assistance to the winter crops. The administration wanted to limit assistance to nonprogram crops.

The chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee stood firm and he said: Absolutely not. We are going to have a bill that treats the need. We are going to have a bill that recognizes Mother Nature has hurt all of those who are in the productive sector of American agriculture. It has hurt the program crops and the nonprogram crops. And week after week, in session after session, the chairman held firm.

I, for one, want to salute his leadership. Because we would not have a package as comprehensive and as generous as we have without his leadership.

Mr. President, I also want to add my words of praise to the staff. Night after night, in late night sessions after late night sessions, they labored to make a rural development package that was good for this country and a drought package that was good for this county.

So, with that, Mr. President, I want to yield the floor and say how proud I am to have participated in what I think are the development of two pieces of legislation that will make a dramatic difference to rural America.

Thank you, Mr. President. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for 4 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, I join, first of all, in commending Senator LEAHY, but I also express my gratitude to Senator CONRAD and others who have played a role in protecting America's rural communities and farms.

PROHIBITION ON SATELLITE SALES

Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, the recent crackdown in the People's Republic of China merited widespread condemnation, both here and throughout most of the world. Both Houses of Congress passed legislation suspending a variety of bilateral economic activities. But one sale in particular is being allowed to proceed, and others may follow in the near future.

Licenses have been issued for the Hughes Corp. to do service work on the Asiasat consortium communications satellite, which will be launched into space by the Government of China. The Hughes Corp. is also selling two communications satellites to Australia, the Aussat group, which will also be launched by the Government of China, but additional licenses have not been issued for these sales. There is some speculation that these licenses will eventually be issued as well.

The Government of China intends to launch these satellites for these consortia for a fee. We do not know exactly how much China will net in hard currency, but the going rate for this kind of thing has been estimated at roughly $30 million a launch. The House foreign aid bill includes a strict prohibition on these particular satellite sales; in the Senate, the State Department authorization bill suspends the export of satellites for launch on rockets owned by the Government of China, but allows a Presidential waiver if the President finds it is in the national interest.

The Bush administration is holding up the Aussat sale, but has allowed some technical data to be forwarded for the Asiasat deal since the June 3–4 massacre in Beijing and the subsequent executions of prodemocracy students and workers. I oppose moving ahead with any additional licensing for these satellite launches, particularly because the message it sends to the Japanese and other nations is that it is alright to back away from their sanctions commitments. Japanese firms and commercial banks, for example, could then make the argument that the United States is seeking to protect its businesses, so why should not the Japanese Government do the same?

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to speak out against any further commercial licensing for critical industrial export items to China. Until prisoners are released, executions are stopped, and a new climate of political liberalization sweeps China, we ought not proceed with these or any other technology transfers to China's ruling clique.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The bill clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico is recognized.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. DOMENICI pertaining to the submission of Senate Resolution 168 are located in today's RECORD under "Submission of Concurrent and Senate Resolutions.")

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

PUERTO RICO STATUS REFERENDUM ACT

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has now ordered reported the Puerto Rico Status Referendum Act which referred to the Finance Committee for consideration of the taxation and social welfare aspects of the three options set forth which are, of course, independence, and statehood, "enhanced commonwealth."

In anticipation of this consideration by the Finance Committee and the Senate's fuller debate on the whole matter, I asked the Congressional Research Service to analyze the effect on selected programs of each status option and also to assess how the Federal tax relationship with Puerto Rico would change under these various options. The first of these analyses was completed earlier this week, and the other a month ago.

I am placing them in the RECORD today in order that the discussion of this hugely important matter may go forward on the basis of relevant facts, which is to say that we might, to some extent at least, know what we are talking about and ultimately voting about.

I would call attention to the important findings concerning social welfare programs under the statehood option. I now cite the CRS study.

Under statehood, extension of the earned income tax credit to Puerto Rico where it is not currently available inasmuch as the Federal income tax does not apply in Puerto Rico, could be a significant new program expenditure and a new social welfare benefit, it having had its origin for that precise purpose.

The Congressional Research Service estimates that the earned income tax credit could cover up to 65 percent of all families with children in Puerto Rico, two-thirds of the population which are families with children. That is a cash return, and as we expect it will be at the end of this Congress, a refundable tax credit.

Mr. President, under statehood, the second finding, replacing the nutrition assistance block grant with the food stamp program, including open-ended funding, would greatly reduce Puerto Rico's program design flexibility and could expand the caseload and program costs by one-third or more.

The third finding, Mr. President, under statehood, replacing the program of aid to the aged, blind, or disabled with the supplemental security income program, and open-ended funding which is the case, would significantly expand the eligibility of the population in Puerto Rico for increased benefits to recipients by as much as tenfold, and consequently greatly increase Federal costs, but also greatly increase social welfare benefits.

I might add that the supplementary security income is the one provision of the family assistance plan that was sent to Congress in 1969 to be extended to the four income-determined, noncontributory, programs under the Social Security Act: Aid to Families with Dependent Children, aid to the blind, aid to the permanently and totally disabled, and old-age assistance.

It was the intention of that proposal that the benefits be nationwide and openended. So the great disparities, for example, in the program and benefits to AFDC would not continue. Well, the only group for whom that provision was not adopted were the children. But the other three programs were incorporated into SSI and now would make their way to the commonwealth under statehood.

Last of the findings, Mr. President, under statehood, the cap on Medicaid funds that currently applies to Puerto Rico would be removed, and a more generous Federal matching formula would be used. As a result, Federal spending for Medicaid in Puerto Rico would more than double. In addition, Puerto Rico would become subject to new requirements for furnishing more extensive coverage to some classes of individuals, while cutting off coverage to others, and Puerto Rico would no longer be able to restrict Medicaid providers to public facilities.

Mr. President, the analysis of the tax relationship that I shall include in the RECORD this afternoon is not as extensive as that concerning social welfare programs, inasmuch as a further study from the staff of the Joint Committee on Taxation is now in preparation. It should be available in little more than a week's time, and I would inform Senators that my office will have copies, should any of them wish to obtain them.

However, on the basis of what we already have, and indeed what we have for some time known, I call attention at this time to a major central fact. The tax benefits associated with section 936 of the Internal Revenue Code now account for about one-third of the total employment in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. I should make explicit, Mr. President, that this is direct and indirect employment, but a third of the jobs there come from 936 industries—the multiplier effect, as economists call the further benefits from wages earned and then spent.

The legislation ordered reported by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee provides for a phaseout of section 936 benefits under statehood ending in 1998. Obviously something such would be required under the uniformity clause of the Constitution.

I emphasize that by present reckoning, the majority of Puerto Rican families have incomes below the Federal poverty line. In our 1986 tax legislation, we went to great lengths to see that no such family pays Federal income taxes. Hence, the majority of Puerto Rican families would, for the immediate future at least, be free of Federal income tax, while they would have available a very considerable range of Federal social welfare programs.

It would thus appear that statehood offers Puerto Ricans the prospect of immediate social welfare benefits, but long-term economic losses, the losses being those to be associated with the disappearance, at least as much as we know, the inevitable disappearance of section 936 benefits, and the assumed decline in those economic activities.

By contrast, Commonwealth promises long-term economic gains, and the continued availability of the very considerable tax incentives associated with 936, such that a third of the island's employment comes from that section, a section originally designed to promote economic investment by American firms in the Philippines, if I may say.

By contrast, Commonwealth status promises long-term economic gains, I say again, but with no immediate social welfare enhancements, or none in the legislation we have before us, and which we will take up in an open-minded manner in the Finance Committee.

These are serious matters and will be seriously debated. A minimum responsibility here in Washington is to ensure that, as much as possible, the facts be made available to those who wish to make informed choices. Imagine our consternation when the Treasury Department testified before the Energy Committee on July 13, stating that it saw no reason why the referendum bill should be "encumbered at this stage" by any speculation concerning the tax and economic consequences of the three options. It cannot be that they would wish the people of Puerto Rico to make their decision in the dark, but certainly they had not shed any light on those decisions. The people of the Commonwealth want, and should have, the facts necessary to make an informed choice.

Mr. President, earlier this year, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, and the distinguished ranking member, held hearings in San Juan on this subject. I was asked to join as an observer from the Finance Committee, which I did, and I think it was probably the case that during our 3 days of hearings, something like half the adult population of Puerto Rico was watching us on television. It was an extraordinary event in the evenings to walk about the old city and be recognized not just by the occasional viewer of the evening news, but by everyone. This is central to the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, as it ought to be.

Of course, it is very much in the mind of President Bush, who proposed this referendum to us in his State of the Union message and stated that his preference—very clear, and it has been well understood—was statehood. I am sure if President Bush were aware of the Treasury Department's view that there is no need to encumber this decision with facts, "do not trouble me with the facts" point of view, that he would be of a different view, and perhaps Treasury would respond.

In any event, Mr. President, the reports I now place in the RECORD are a beginning—I believe a good one. I would like most especially to express my appreciation to Carolyn Merck of the Congressional Research Service who headed the study on the welfare effects of the proposal for a referendum on the status of Puerto Rico. I express my appreciation also to David Brumbaugh, of the CRS, who did the analysis of Federal taxes and Puerto Rico under the statehood, independence, and commonwealth options.

Mr. President, may I say that I am aware that I place a large document in the RECORD on this concluding day, as we hope or expect, of this portion of the first session of the 101st Congress, but I do so because we are at exactly the point where the issue of the consequences in terms of social welfare benefits and taxation of the three options to be considered by Puerto Rico comes before us.

The Senate Finance Committee will hold hearings, I am sure, in the autumn. Before we do, it is well that the public should have available the analysis of what the choices before us entail.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have two memoranda prepared by CRS printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

CONGRESSIONAL RESEARCH SERVICE,
Washington, DC, July 6, 1989.

To: Hon. Daniel P. Moynihan. Attention: Ted Zukoski.

From: David L. Brumbaugh, Analyst in Public Finance, Economics Division.

Subject: Federal Taxes and Puerto Rico under the Statehood, Independence, and Commonwealth Options of S. 712, 101st Congress.

This memorandum responds to your request for an explanation of how the Federal tax relationship with Puerto Rico would change under each of the options that S. 712 would present to the people of Puerto Rico for referendum. The discussion that follows begins by explaining how current Federal tax laws apply to Puerto Rico. Under S. 712's Commonwealth option, these laws would generally remain in place. The memorandum continues by looking at the changes the particular statehood and independence options contained in S. 712 would bring.

CURRENT LAW

Pueto Rico's current tax relationship with the Federal Government is best understood by looking at how the United States defines its jurisdiction to tax and how Puerto Rico fits into that jurisdiction. In general, the United States asserts its tax jurisdiction on the basis of both the source of income and the identity of the person or firm earning the income. If income has its source in the United States, the United States generally taxes that income, regardless of who earns it. Thus, all individuals and corporations are generally subject to U.S. taxes on income earned in the United States, regardless of their nationality. On the other hand, if an individual is a U.S. citizen, the U.S. taxes the person's income regardless of the country in which it is earned; U.S. citizens are taxed on their foreign as well as domestic income. To alleviate double-taxation, however, the U.S. permits foreign taxes to be credited against U.S. taxes on foreign-source income.

As with U.S. citizens, the United States taxes corporations that are chartered in the United States on their worldwide income but permits the crediting of foreign taxes. Thus, if a firm conducts its foreign operations through a foreign branch of the U.S. parent corporation, its foreign income is subject to U.S. taxes on a current basis. At the same time, however, foreign-source income of foreign corporations is beyond the U.S. tax jurisdiction. Thus, if a U.S. firm conducts it foreign operations through a subsidiary corporation chartered in a foreign country, income the subsidiary earns is exempt from U.S. taxes until it is remitted to the U.S. parent corporation as intra-firm dividends. U.S taxes on foreign-source income can thus be postponed indefinitely. This characteristic of the U.S. tax code is usually referred to as the "deferral principle."

Puerto Rico fits into this structure much like a foreign country but with some very important differences. U.S. corporations and firms, for example, are generally permitted to claim Puerto Rican taxes as foreign tax credits.[1] Also, Puerto Rico is not considered part of the United States for tax purposes.[2] For firms, the result is that corporations chartered in Puerto Rico are treated like foreign corporations and are not subject to U.S. taxes on income earned outside the mainland United States. As in foreign countries, then, the deferral principle is generally available in Puerto Rico for U.S. firms that wish to use it.

Instead of deferral, however, most firms that invest in Puerto Rico use the possessions tax credit: an alternative tax benefit that is not available in foreign countries. The credit, provided by section 936 of the Federal tax code, provides a full exemption from Federal taxes rather than mere postponement and is widely used by U.S firms with operations in Puerto Rico. Under its terms, qualifying U.S. corporations can receive a tax credit equal to the Federal income taxes they would otherwise owe on income from active business operations and certain financial investments in Puerto Rico. Thus, while section 936 technically provides a tax credit, the credit is, in effect, a tax exemption for income earned in Puerto Rico. To qualify for the credit, a firm must be incorporated in the United States (a subsidiary corporation cannot therefore qualify for both deferral and the possessions tax credit), must earn at least 80 percent of its income in the possessions, and must derive at least 75 percent of its income from the active conduct of a business in the possessions. Firms with extensive operations in the mainland United States and elsewhere ordinarily meet these requirement by setting up separate subsidiary corporations for their Puerto Rican operations.[3]

Section 936 generally provides a more generous tax benefit than the deferral principle. Under deferral, U.S. firms can invest in Puerto Rico through corporations chartered in Puerto Rico, and, as long as the subsidiaries' earnings are not repatriated to the U.S. parent corporations, they are exempt from Federal taxes. When the earnings are repatriated, however, they are subject to Federal taxes in the hands of the U.S. parent corporation. Under section 936, possession-source business income of qualifying U.S. corporations is exempt from Federal taxes. Further, since parents can deduct from taxable income dividends received from subsidiary U.S. (but not foreign) corporations, the possessions-source income is also not taxed upon repatriation to the parent corporation.

Turning now to individuals, Puerto Rico are citizens of the United States and, as noted above, U.S. citizens are subject to U.S. taxes on their worldwide income. Normally, then, Puerto Ricon citizens would be subject to Federal taxes on their worldwide income just like other U.S. citizens. Special provision is made for Puerto Rico, however, by section 933 of the Internal Revenue Code. Under its terms, year-long residents of Puerto Rico are exempt from Federal taxes on income from Puerto Rican sources. Puerto Rican residents, however, are subject to Federal taxes on income from any other geographic source, including the mainland United States. Also Puerto Rico levies its own individual income tax on residents of Puerto Rico.

The tax code also makes special provision for Puerto Rico with regard to excise taxes. Under section 7652 of the Internal Revenue Code, revenues from Federal excise taxes on good manufactured in Puerto Rico generally are rebated or "covered over" to the treasury of Puerto Rico. Since 1984, however, certain limitations have been imposed on the rebates. With respct to distilled spirits, rebated taxes are limited to those imposed on rum. Rebate of taxes on other items is prohibited unless more than 50 percent of the value of the taxed item is actually added in Puerto Rico.[4]

STATEHOOD

The statehood option specified by S. 712 generally provides that Puerto Rico will ultimately be treated like the fifty States for purposes of Federal income taxes. Individuals residing in Puerto Rico would be subject to Federal taxes on their worldwide income. And at least in the long run, corporations would be subjected to full Federal taxation on income earned in Puerto Rico; neither the possessions tax credit nor deferral would apply. But while the bill provides that "Provisions of the Internal Revenue Code concerning Federal Income Taxes shall immediately apply to Puerto Rico" (section 16 of the bill), S. 712's statehood language also contains important transition provisions designed to "expedite the adjustment of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico from the tax structure of the territory to the fiscal and economic system of the State" (section 16(a)).

Among the transition provisions is a general statement that "Provision shall be made by Congress so that economic and fiscal exceptions of the Internal Revenue Code, already granted" would temporarily remain in effect. The possessions tax code is explicitly listed by the bill as one of the tax code's "exceptions." The bill would continue the full application of section 936 for an unspecified period of time before gradually phasing the credit out, also over an unspecified time period.

Section 993's tax exemption for individuals residing in Puerto Rico could certainly be construed as an "exception" to normally applicable tax treatment in the case of Puerto Rico. The nature of the deferral of taxes on income earned by corporations chartered in Puerto Rico is less certain, but could also be considered an exception. Still, neither of these tax provisions are explicitly listed as exceptions by S. 712. Whether they would be temporarily continued is thus uncertain.

Another transition provision relates to tax revenue. The statehood language of S. 712 provides that the existing income tax laws of Puerto Rico would stand repealed upon admisssion of Puerto Rico as a State, a measure that would deprive the State government of an important source of revenues. Under the statehood provisions, however, proceeds from the application of Federal income taxes to Puerto Rico are to be transferred into Puerto Rico's treasury in gradually diminishing amounts for an unspecified number of years.

Finally, the statehood language provides that an "omnibus act" will be enacted by Congress "to ensure that the people of Puerto Rico attain equal social and economic opportunities with the residents of the several States" (section 16(c)). Included in the act would be "measures necessary to assure appropriate continuity" for Puerto Rico in the treatment of alcohol excise taxes. Thus, the omnibus bill would apparently continue the coverover of taxes to Puerto Rico, at least in the case of taxes on rum.

INDEPENDENCE

For firms, S. 712's independence provisions are clear. As noted above, Puerto Rico is currently treated much like a foreign country in that foreign tax credits and deferral of U.S. Federal taxes are available. More appealing for most firms, however, is section 936, whose tax exemption surpasses deferral in its generosity. If S. 712 made no special provision, section 936 would no longer be available. As with other foreign countries, deferral would continue to apply.

As with its statehood provisions, however, the independence provisions of S. 712 contain language that would retain the possessions tax credit at least temporarily. Under the bill, section 936 would remain in full effect for 15 years following independence. In the tenth year after independence, the bill provides for a "Joint Commission on Taxation" to be appointed by the United States and Puerto Rico whose purpose would be to study and recommend changes (if any) to be made in the Possessions Tax Credit at the end of the fifteen-year period. Thus, the independence provisions leave the future of the possessions tax credit undetermined and in the hands of the Joint Commission.[5]

For individuals, the results of S. 712's independence provisions are uncertain. Normally, the United States taxes individuals who are neither U.S. residents nor U.S. citizens only on income they earn in the United States. Thus, if post-independence Puerto Rico were to be like other foreign countries, Puerto Ricans would be taxed by the United States only on income they earn in the United States. The independence provisions of S. 712 are, however, ambiguous. To begin, the bill provides that after independence, U.S. laws that apply to Puerto Rico will no longer be in force. This provision implies that the U.S. tax code's section 933 tax exemption for individuals will no longer apply after independence. Normally, however, residents of foreign countries are beyond U.S. tax jurisdiction, and the removal of section 933's exemption would not matter.

S. 712's citizenship provisions, however, complicate matters. As noted above, part of the United States tax jurisdiction is based on the nationality of the taxpayer: the United States taxes U.S. citizens on their worldwide income. Under the independence provisions of S. 712, Puerto Ricans will automatically retain their United States citizenship unless they elect to relinquish it. At first glance, then, it appears that the United States will tax at least some Puerto Ricans (those who do not actively relinquish their U.S. citizenship) on their worldwide income after independence.

However, several other provisions of S. 712 make this outcome uncertain. In the first place, the independence alternative states that U.S. citizenship will be retained provided that the person in question will not be subject to any "obligation contrary to the sovereignty of the Republic of Puerto Rico." (Section 5.1(g); the only obligation the bill mentions explicitly is military registration.) Second, the bill provides that each nation (i.e., the United States and Puerto Rico) will have taxing jurisdiction over income from sources within its territory (section 5.4(d)). Even this second provision, however, does not rule out continued U.S. taxation of Puerto Ricans on income earned outside Puerto Rico. Further, the existence of taxing jurisdiction on the part of one nation does not preclude the existence of a taxing jurisdiction over the same income on the part of another nation. Indeed, overlapping tax jurisdictions are normal in international taxation and are the reason most countries grant their taxpayers foreign tax credits.

Because U.S. laws that apply to Puerto Rico would no longer be in force after independence, Federal excise taxes would not be collected on items produced in Puerto Rico. Accordingly, there would be no coverover of excise tax revenues to the Treasury of Puerto Rico after independence.

Subject: Effects of the Proposal for a Referendum on the Status of Puerto Rico.

In response to your request, this memorandum presents an analysis of the effect on selected social welfare programs of alternative outcomes of a referendum on the status of Puerto Rico. The alternatives are (1) statehood, (2) independence, or (3) "enhanced" commonwealth status. Our analysis is based on Senator Johnston's and Senator McClure's amendment in the nature of a substitute to S. 712 as of July 27, 1989.

The important findings of our review of how social welfare programs would be affected by a change in Puerto Rico's status are:

Under statehood, extension of the earned income tax credit to Puerto Rico, where it is not currently available, could be a significant new program expenditure, potentially covering up to 65 percent of all families with children in Puerto Rico;

Under statehood, replacing the nutrition assistance block grant with the food stamp program, including open-ended funding, (a) would greatly reduce Puerto Rico's program design flexibility, and (b) could expand the caseload and program costs by one-third or more;

Under statehood, replacing the program of aid to the aged, blind, or disabled with the supplemental security income program and open-ended funding would significantly expand the eligible population in Puerto Rico, increase benefits to recipients by as much as 10-fold and, consequently, greatly increase Federal costs;

Under statehood, the cap on medicaid funds that currently applies to Puerto Rico would be removed and a more generous Federal matching formula would be used. As a result, Federal spending for medicaid in Puerto Rico could more than double. In addition, Puerto Rico would become subject to new requirements for furnishing more extensive coverage to some classes of individuals while cutting off coverage to others, and Puerto Rico would no longer be able to restrict medicaid providers to public facilities.

Under independence the following issues would arise concerning the social security system: (1) if social security beneficiaries in Puerto Rico continued to receive payments from the U.S. system, but the contributions of workers that formerly went to the U.S. system instead were credited to the new Puerto Rican system, Puerto Rico would benefit at the expense of the U.S. social security system; (2) eventually, the new Puerto Rican system probably would have to provide lower benefits or have a higher rate of taxation than under the current arrangement (Puerto Rico now receives approximately 50 percent more in benefits than it pays in social security taxes).

This memo is organized as follows: First is a brief description of our understanding of each of the alternatives for the status of Puerto Rico as included in substitute S. 712, with specific reference to the operation of various social welfare programs; second are data on the demographic and economic characteristics of the population of Puerto Rico and relevant comparisons with data for the States; third is a description of how selected programs operate in the 50 States, how those programs currently operate in Puerto Rico, what the effect of a change in the status of Puerto Rico would be on each program, and important program policy issues that would arise from a change in status.

As agreed in discussions with your staff, the programs covered in our analysis are:

Aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) (p. 9-12).

Supplemental security income (SSI) and the Puerto Rico counterpart, aid to the aged, blind, or disabled (AABD) (p. 13-18).

Food stamps and the Puerto Rico counterpart, the nutrition assistance block grant (p. 19-31).

Social security retirement, disability, and survivor benefits (p. 32-34).

Medicaid (p. 35-41).

Medicare (p. 42-47).

Unemployment compensation (UC) (p. 48-50).

Earned income tax credit (EITC) (p. 51-52).

Maternal and child health (MCH) block grant (p. 53-55).

Title IV-B child welfare services (p. 56-57).

Title IV-E foster care and adoption assistance (p. 58-59).

Title XX social services (p. 60-61).

Please note that we do not attempt definitive cost or budget estimates, although we discuss issues concerning the general implications of the alternatives for cost and coverage of the population.

[5] The bill provides that if the Joint Commission fails to reach agreement on the future of section 936, repatriations of Puerto Rico-source income will gradually become subject to U.S. taxes in 10 percent increments. Note, however, that it is not repatriations that would be newly subject to full taxation if Puerto Rico were to be treated in exactly the same manner as other foreign countries. Since Possessions Corporations are necessarily incorporated in the United States, the Corporations themselves would, in effect, move from tax exempt to taxable status. The treatment of repatriations, in contrast, would not change and parent corporations could continue to claim dividends-received deductions for them. Thus, when the independence provisions gradually subject repatriations to U.S. taxation, they are not actually phasing in Puerto Rico's full treatment as a foreign country.

Alternatives for the Status of Puerto Rico, as Proposed in Substitute S. 712

Statehood

Puerto Rico would become a State equal in standing with the 50 States. All laws and programs operating in the 50 States would operate in Puerto Rico on the same terms and according to the same rules and regulations that apply in the other States. Where there is precedent for variation in program operations in individual States, such as eligibility and benefit criteria for certain programs in Alaska and Hawaii, those precedents might be considered in establishing such a program in Puerto Rico. One exception is made that would allow, until October 1, 1997, the continuation of the nutrition assistance block grant instead of the food stamp program.

Independence

Puerto Rico would become a separate and sovereign nation, although any person with U.S. citizenship would retain that citizenship. Presumably, the final legislation will provide for a transition period during which Federal spending in Puerto Rico would be replaced with a consolidated aid package that would be paid for several years after the proclamation of independence. Once Puerto Rico is fully independent, no program available to U.S. citizens who reside in the States or territories would be available to residents of Puerto Rico, whether or not U.S. citizens. A special task force would be appointed to deal with transition issues for the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program (social security) and medicare.

Enhanced Commonwealth Status

Puerto Rico's commonwealth status would be somewhat altered. Federal grant-in-aid programs, with specific exceptions for programs that provide payments to individuals, could be consolidated and subjected to reduced application and reporting requirements. The funds could be used for the purposes of any of the programs included in the consolidation, and matching fund requirements could be waived by the Federal administering agency.

Income and Demographic Characteristics in Puerto Rico

Tables 1 and 2 illustrate how the income and household characteristics of the population in Puerto Rico compare to the U.S. population as a whole and to a State. (Mississippi is used in this comparison.) The data were tabulated from the 1980 decennial census. Even though the data are 10 years old, the characteristics of the populations in the different jurisdictions probably have not changed substantially in relation to each other.[1]

The data show that the average family is significantly larger in Puerto Rico than in the States (4.01 persons per family compared with 3.27 persons), and the median age in Puerto Rico is 4.5 years younger than in the States, reflecting a greater number of children per family. A slightly higher proportion of children in Puerto Rico live in single, female-headed families than do those in the United States, but a higher proportion live in two-parent families than do in Mississippi. The elderly in Puerto Rico are more likely to live in a family unit than are the elderly in the United States, which also increases the average family size.

Income in Puerto Rico is significantly lower than in any of the 50 States, which is an important consideration for evaluating the potential effects of extending open-ended, means-tested transfer programs there. Measured against the poverty threshold that applies in the States, in 1979 the incidence of poverty was six times greater in Puerto Rico than in the United States as a whole; 58.1 percent of families in Puerto Rico fell below the poverty threshold compared with 18.9 percent in Mississippi and 9.6 percent in the United States as a whole. The median family income in Puerto Rico in 1979 was less than 30 percent of the U.S. median and was 40 percent of that in Mississippi, which had the lowest income of the 50 States. The median annual earnings of men in Puerto Rico who worked at any time during 1979 were 54 percent of the median earnings of men in Mississippi, and 41 percent of the earnings of men in the total United States. The poverty rate among the elderly is substantially higher in Puerto Rico than in the States. Only 8.1 percent of elderly persons in the States live in families with incomes below poverty, but in Puerto Rico nearly 60 percent of the elderly live in poor families.

Table 3 shows that in 1987 the labor force participation rate in Puerto Rico was lower than in the United States as a whole: 44.1 percent of the population age 16 and over was in the labor force in Puerto Rico, compared with 65.6 percent in the United States. During that year the unemployment rate in Puerto Rico was well above that in the United States, 16.8 percent compared with 6.2 percent respectively.

Altogether, the data for Puerto Rico portray a population that is very different from that of the States. The major differences in the income distribution indicate that, should Puerto Rico become a State, applying the welfare program eligibility and benefit criteria that pertain in the 50 States could extend those benefits to a very large portion of the Island's population. The programs that would have the greatest impact if extended to Puerto Rico are food stamps, SSI, and the EITC, for which benefits are nationally uniform and are not set by the States. Although a detailed economic analysis of the effects of Puerto Rican statehood or enhancement of its commonwealth status on the distribution of personal income there is not undertaken in this memo, the data indicate that the introduction of welfare benefits at levels equal to those in the States could have important consequences for the Island's economy.

[1] The definition of a family is two or more persons related by blood, marriage, or adoption living together; "unrelated individuals" are single persons living alone or with others to whom they are not related by blood, marriage, or adoption. The term "household" includes families, single individuals living alone, and two or more unrelated individuals living together as one household unit.

The Effects of the Referendum Alternatives on Social Welfare Programs

Following is a description of the implications of statehood, independence, and enhanced commonwealth status on various social welfare programs. Each program discussion includes a description of how the program operates now in the 50 States, how it operates in Puerto Rico, and the implications for program operations and scope under the alternatives proposed for referendum.

AID TO FAMILIES WITH DEPENDENT CHILDREN (AFDC)

The current program in the States

Eligibility and Benefits in the 50 States and the District of Columbia

Aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) is the major cash welfare program for needy children and their families. The AFDC program offers Federal funds to help pay State costs of providing cash payments to needy children (and their needy parents or other caretakers) who are under age 18 (or at State option, 19, if the child is still in high school or training); living in the home of a parent or specified relative; and deprived of parental support or care because of the death, continued absence from the home, or physical or mental incapacity of a a parent, or, at State option, until FY 1991 (FY 1993 for the outlying areas), when it becomes a mandatory component of AFDC, the unemployment of the principal wage earner.

In FY 1987, 98 percent of AFDC children had two living parents (almost half of whom were unwed) but 87 percent lived with one parent, usually the mother. Only 11.4 percent of the children were in two-parent families (7.9 percent in families with an unemployed parent, 3.5 percent with an incapacitated parent).

States define "need," set their own benefit levels, establish (within Federal limitations) income and resource limits, and administer the program or supervise its administration. All States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands operate an AFDC program. American Samoa, effective October 1, 1988, has the authority to operate an AFDC program, but as of spring 1989 had not chosen to do so. To qualify for AFDC, a family must have a dependent child, countable income below the State's payment standard and countable resources below the State's resource limit; if able-bodied and without a preschool child, the parent must register for work or training. (Under the Family Support Act, all States must adopt a new job opportunities and basic skills (JOBS) training program by October 1, 1990; States generally are required to enroll all parents with children under age 3 in their education, work, or training activities if resources permit.) Benefits vary by family size; in January 1989, monthly AFDC payments to a three-person family with no countable income ranged in the 48 contiguous States from $118 in Alabama to $665 in Suffolk County, New York. The Federal countable resource limit is $1,000 per family. Some major resources, however, such as the home in which the family is living and up to $1,500 in equity value of a car (less in two States), are not counted as resources. The average monthly benefit paid in FY 1988 was $370 per family.

Participation

In FY 1988, 10.9 million persons in 3.7 million families were enrolled in the AFDC program in the 50 States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Virgin Islands. AFDC children totaled 7.3 million, 11.5 percent of the U.S. child population.

Funding and Expenditures

In the 50 States and the District of Columbia, the Federal Government pays at least 50 percent of each States' AFDC benefit payments, and 50 percent for most administrative costs in all States. Federal matching for AFDC benefits varies among States and, within limits, is inversely related to State per capita income. The Federal share of a State's AFDC payments is determined by the matching formula specified for medicaid in TItle XIX of the Social Security Act. The share of AFDC benefits paid by Federal funds ranges in FY 1989 from 50 percent to 79.8 percent (Mississippi), and unlimited matching funds are authorized. For the outlying areas, Guam, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, 75 percent Federal matching is provided, but the law imposes a ceiling on Federal funds.

In FY 1988, total AFDC program costs for the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and the outlying areas amounted to almost $19 billion, of which 88 percent, $16.6 billion, was spent on benefit payments and the rest on administrative costs. The Federal Government paid nearly 55 percent, $9.1 billion, of AFDC benefit expenditures.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Eligibility and Benefits in Puerto Rico

Under the AFDC program, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico is considered a "State." Thus, generally the categorical, income, and resource eligibility criteria described above apply. However, the new law requiring all States to offer AFDC (for at least part of the year) to two-parent families in which the principal earner is unemployed does not take effect in Puerto Rico until October 1, 1992, 2 years later than in the 50 States and the District of Columbia.

In FY 1987, 98 percent of AFDC children in Puerto Rico had two living parents (about 40 percent of whom were unwed), but 75 percent lived with only one parent, usually the mother. More than one-fifth of the children were in two-parent families with an incapacitated parent. Puerto Rico did not offer AFDC for unemployed parents.

Puerto Rico's maximum AFDC benefit varies by family size, and for a three-person family is $90 per month (this amount assumes an average rent payment of $20 per month). This is $28 below the lowest maximum payment in the 50 States (Alabama). The average payment among families of all sizes in FY 1988 was $101 per month, compared with $370 among the States.

Participation

In FY 1988, 177,360 persons in nearly 55,000 families in Puerto Rico received AFDC benefits. In 1980, a total of 117,669 Puerto Rican children received AFDC, 9.6 percent of the Island's child population (more recent percentage data are unavailable).

Funding and Expenditures

The major differences between Puerto Rico and the other "States" is the way its AFDC program is funded. The 50 States and the District of Columbia receive open-ended funding, with a minimum Federal matching rate for benefits of 50 percent and a maximum Federal match of 83 percent. In contrast, as noted before, Puerto Rico and the other outlying areas are subject to a "cap" on Federal funding for several programs grouped together. The Federal Government pays 75 percent of Puerto Rico's AFDC benefit payments and several other social welfare benefits up to a specified limit. Section 1108 of the Social Security Act places an annual limit of $82 million ($72 million before FY 1989) on the sum available to Puerto Rico for matching funds to help fund AFDC, emergency assistance, aid to the aged, blind, or disabled, and foster care and adoption assistance. The Act provides that Puerto Rico may use funds not expended within the section 1108 cap for its Title XX social services program. (In effect, this Title XX provision generally allows Puerto Rico to always receive the amount of the Federal cap.)

In FY 1988, total AFDC benefit payments in Puerto Rico amounted to $66.7 million (qualifying Puerto Rico for $50 million in 75 percent Federal matching funds).

Implications of Statehood

If Puerto Rico were to be treated like the 50 States and the District of Columbia in terms of its AFDC funding, the cap on Federal funding would be removed, and its Federal matching rate would be raised from the 75 percent rate to the maximum permitted in law, 83 percent. This is because Puerto Rico's 1987 per capita income ($4,997) was less than one-third that of the United States ($15,481). These relationships, under the existing formula, would qualify Puerto Rico for the maximum matching rate.

According to data from the Department of Health and Human Services, total FY 1987 benefit payments in Puerto Rico for AFDC ($66.4 million), emergency assistance ($207,000), and aid to the aged, blind, or disabled ($17.2 million) totaled $83.8 million, qualifying Puerto Rico for maximum matching funds (at a 75 percent rate) of $62.86 million. In addition, administrative costs for AFDC totaled $14.1 million, qualifying Puerto Rico (at a 50 percent rate) for matching funds of $7.05 million. Data are not available on expenditures in Puerto Rico on foster care and adoption assistance, but the Administration has indicated that Puerto Rico does not receive funding under tht Title IV-E foster care and adoption assistance programs. It appears that Puerto Rico in FY 1987 did not use the full $72 million available in that year for the programs listed above, in which case it could apply the rest to its Title XX social services program. It is unclear how Puerto Rico would respond to open-ended benefit funding for AFDC at an 83 percent matching rate. By spending somewhat less money Puerto Rico could maintain existing program levels.

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible to participate in the AFDC program. Presumably, Federal AFDC funds would be included in the consolidated aid package that would be paid to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

The Family Support Administration estimated that in FY 1988 the Federal Government reimbursed Puerto Rico $52.3 million for AFDC benefit payments, $92,561 for emergency assistance payments (also part of Title IV-A of the Social Security Act), and about $7.2 million for administration and training costs, for a total of approximately $59.6 million related to families and children. These figures reflect adjustments for previous claims. (An additional amount was reimbursed in FY 1988 for cash aid to the aged, blind, or disabled. See next section.)

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

Section 407 of the substitute S. 712 provides for the consolidation of certain "grant-in-aid" programs. Because the law referred to in section 407 excludes "direct payments to classes of individuals," the provision presumably would not apply to the AFDC program, which makes grants to States for payments to classes of individuals. If commonwealth status prevailed, the existing AFDC program would continue (unchanged) in Puerto Rico.

SUPPLEMENTAL SECURITY INCOME (SSI)

The current program in the States

Eligibility and Benefits in the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and the Northern Mariana Islands

The supplemental security income (SSI) program is a Federal program administered by the Social Security Administration that guarantees a minimum level of cash income to needy aged, blind, and disabled persons. To qualify for SSI payments, a person must satisfy the program criteria for age, blindness, or disability. The aged are defined as persons 65 years and older. Blind individuals are those with 20/200 vision or less with the use of a correcting lens in the person's better eye, or those with tunnel vision of 20 degrees or less. Disabled individuals are those unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity (SGA) by reason of a medically determined physical or mental impairment expected to result in death or that has lasted or can be expected to last, for a continuous period of at least 12 months. In addition, to be considered "disabled," a child under age 18 must have an impairment of "comparable severity" with that of an adult. SSI law is contained in (the second) Title XVI of the Social Security Act.

In 1989, individuals and couples are determined to be eligible for a Federal SSI payment if their countable income does not exceed $368 per month for an individual living independently or $553 for a couple living independently. Benefit levels are adjusted for price inflation at the same time and by the same percentage as social security benefits. Countable income is subtracted from the Federal SSI guarantee (and State supplementary payment, if available) to determine SSI eligibility and benefit amount.

Under the SSI program, $20 of monthly income from virtually any source (such as social security benefits, but not need-tested income such as veterans' pensions) is disregarded in determining eligibility and benefit amount. In addition, the first $65 of monthly earned income plus one-half of remaining earnings are disregarded. Thus, the income level at which Federal SSI eligibility ends for an individual (i.e., the "breakeven" amount) is $338 if the person has only unearned income, and $821 per month if the person has only earned income. (The corresponding figures for a couple are $573 and $1,191.) In effect, this means that the marginal benefit-reduction rate is 50 percent for earned income and 100 percent for unearned income.

About 42 percent of SSI recipients receive a State supplement. Currently, 26 States and the District of Columbia supplement the Federal guarantee for individuals living independently, by monthly amounts ranging from $2 to $384 (Connecticut). Most States provide supplements for recipients in group living arrangements.

To determine eligibility and benefits the SSI program generally takes into account all types of income, including earned, unearned, and support and maintenance furnished in cash or in kind. However, Congress recognized that many aged, blind, or disabled individuals live with relatives or friends, making it difficult to determine the exact value of the support and maintenance furnished in kind. Thus, if an SSI applicant or recipient is "living in another person's household and receiving support and maintenance in-kind from such person," the value of such in-kind assistance is presumed to equal one-third of the Federal SSI benefit standard. The maximum Federal SSI benefit payable to such individual or couple is two-thirds of the Federal SSI guarantee level.

Eligibility for SSI is restricted to qualified persons who have countable assets of not more than $2,000, or not more than $3,000 in the case of qualified couples. In determining assets, a number of items are excluded. Totally disregarded is the individual's home; and, within "reasonable" limits set by the Secretary of the Department of Health and Human Services these assets are disregarded: household goods, personal effects, an automobile, and a brial space for the individual, spouse, and members of the immediate family.

The income of an ineligible spouse who lives with an adult SSI applicant or recipient is considered in determining the eligibility and amount of payment to the individual. Similarly, part of the income of the parents of a disabled or blind child under the age of 18 is counted as available to the child and used in determining his SSI benefit amount, if any. Further, an individual's resources are deemed to include those of his ineligible spouse (with whom he lives) or in the case of a child under the age of 18, those of his parents with whom he lives. In 1987, there were 41,200 spouse-to-spouse and 22,500 parent-to-child cases in which deeming reduced the benefit; these figures do not include the cases in which individuals were made ineligible because of the deeming provisions.

In addition to the categorical requirements and income and resources rules, to receive SSI a person must be a citizen of the United States or an alien who is lawfully admitted to the United States; live in the United States or the Northern Mariana Islands; apply for all other benefits to which he is entitled; and if he is disabled, accept vocational rehabilitation services if they are offered.

The Commonwealth of Northern Mariana Islands is the only outlying U.S. area with the SSI program. The Northern Marianas Covenant (P.L. 94-241) was signed into law in March 1976. It changed the status of the Northern Mariana Islands from a part of the United Nations Trust Territory of the Pacific administered by the United States to that of a full U.S. Commonwealth. Terms of the covenant extended SSI to the new Commonwealth on the same terms as in the 50 States and the District of Columbia, effective in 1978. Congress has never passed proposals to extend the SSI program to the other U.S. Commonwealth (Puerto Rico) or the other U.S. outlying areas of Guam, American Samoa, and the Virgin Islands.

The SSI program, which began operations in 1974, replaced the matching-grant programs of old-age assistance, aid to the blind, and aid to the permanently and totally disabled in the 50 States and the District of Columbia.

Participation

It is estimated that nearly 4.5 million persons will receive SSI benefits in FY 1989; 2.0 million persons aged 65 or older (almost 7 percent of the U.S. aged population) and 2.5 million blind or disabled persons, approximately 290,000 of whom are estimated to be children. In September 1988, the average monthly SSI payment was $259; the average monthly Federal SSI payment was $226, and the average amount of State supplementation was $122.

Funding and Expenditures

Federal SSI benefits and the cost of administering the program are financed from general funds from the Treasury. The Social Security Administration also administers the payment of State-financed State supplementary SSI payments for 26 States and the District of Columbia. These administrative costs are paid by general funds from the Treasury.

In FY 1989 it is estimated that the Federal Government will pay 77 percent of total SSI program costs ($14.7 billion) and the States, 23 percent. IN FY 1988, the SSI program cost the Federal Government $11.4 billion. Ninety-two percent of this amount was spent on Federal SSI benefit payments and the rest was spent on administrative costs, beneficiary services, and demonstration projects.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Eligibility and Benefits of Aid to the Aged, Blind, or Disabled in Puerto Rico

The SSI program is not available in Puerto Rico. Instead, Puerto Rico operates an assistance program of aid to the aged, blind, or disabled (AABD) under Title XVI of the Social Security Act. As with AFDC, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico sets eligibility requirements (within Federal guidelines) and benefit levels. The Federal Government provides a grant to the Commonwealth to meet a share of the program's cost.

Aged persons are defined as those age 65 and older. The definition for blindness is virtually the same as that used for the SSI program; there is no age requirement for blind persons (i.e., blind children always have been eligible for benefits under both programs). Disability is defined by Puerto Rico, but is restricted to those age 18 or older.

To qualify for assistance in Puerto Rico, an aged, blind, or disabled person must have countable resources of no more than $2,000 and countable income of less than the maximum benefit, which equals $32 per month plus 50 percent of actual shelter costs. If shelter costs are assumed to be $20 monthly (reported by Administration officials as the average amount paid for rent by welfare recipients), the income level at which an individual with no other income would no longer qualify for adult assistance payments is $42 per month. In FY 1987, the average monthly benefit was approximately $36.

Under the AABD program not all earned income is counted. In the case of an aged or disabled person the law says that of the first $80 per month of earned income, the State agency may disregard not more than $20 plus one-half of the remainder. Thus, the breakeven level for an aged or disabled AABD recipient who has only earned income is $92 per month (assumes shelter costs of $20 per month). In the case of a blind AABD recipient, the State agency must disregard the first $85 per month of earned income plus one-half of remaining earnings. Thus, the breakeven level for a blind AABD recipient who has only earned income is $169 per month (assumes shelter costs of $20 per month). In effect, this means that (1) 100 percent of unearned income is counted in determining the AABD benefit amount, (2) the marginal benefit-reduction rate is 100 percent for the income of aged or disabled persons, and (3) the marginal benefit-reduction rate is 50 percent for the earned income of blind persons.

Participation

In FY 1987, 40,323 persons in Puerto Rico received AABD assistance payments: 16,297 aged persons, 278 blind persons, and 23,748 disabled persons. (In 1980, the most recent year with age data, about 8 percent of aged Puerto Ricans received AABD payments.)

Funding and Expenditures

Puerto Rico and the other outlying areas are subject to a "cap" on Federal funding. The Federal Government pays 75 percent of Puerto Rico's assistance payments to aged, blind, or disabled persons up to a specified limit (which must also cover the Federal share of costs of various other social welfare programs.) The Social Security Act places an annual limit of $82 million in FY 1989 and years thereafter on the sum available to Puerto Rico for matching payments to help fund programs of aid to families with dependent children, emergency assistance, aid to the aged, blind, or disabled, and foster care and adoption assistance.

In FY 1987, total AABD assistance payments in Puerto Rico amounted to $17.2 million (qualifying Puerto Rico for a maximum of $12.9 million in Federal matching funds).

If Puerto Rico were treated like the 50 States, the District of Columbia, and the Northern Mariana Islands, the Social Security Administration would extend the Federal SSI program to it, at 100 percent Federal expense. SSI then would replace AABD, providing much larger benefits, and much higher eligibility limits. Furthermore, the SSI program would cover disabled children, excluded from the AABD program.

The Federal SSI guarantee to an individual currently is $368 per month. In Puerto Rico the maximum money payment to a needy aged, blind, or disabled person in 1987 under the adult assistance programs was $32 per month plus 50 percent of actual shelter costs. A jump of this magnitude in benefit amounts undoubtedly would vastly expand the eligible population. The exact scope is unknown. However, when SSI replaced the cash welfare programs to aged, blind, or disabled persons in the States, the number of recipients rose nationwide by more than one-third. From 1973, the last year of the old cash welfare programs for aged, blind, or disabled persons, to 1975, the second year of the SSI program, 19 States had increases of more than 50 percent in the number of cash recipients (numbers more than doubled in 5 States).

Puerto Rico no longer would have to pay the 25 percent matching rate required under the AABD program. It is unknown how Puerto Rico would use such released funds. But, because the Federal SSI guarantee is relatively high (equal to 88 percent of per capita income in Puerto Rico), it is virtually certain that these funds would not be used to supplement the Federal SSI guarantee. Because statehood would require Puerto Rico to give automatic eligibility for medicaid to SSI recipients, funds would be needed for the expanded population eligible for medicaid (although many might already have medicaid coverage as medically needy persons).

Implications of Independence

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under the AABD or the SSI program. Presumably, Federal funds used for AABD would be included in the consolidated aid package that would be paid to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence. Based on data from the Family Support Administration, it is estimated that in FY 1988 the Federal Government reimbursed Puerto Rico $13.2 million for the cost of its program for needy aged, blind, or disabled persons.

Implications of Enhanced Commonwealth Status

Section 407 of the substitute S. 712 provides for the consolidation of certain "grant-in-aid" programs. Because the law referred to in section 407 excludes "direct payments to classes of individuals," the provision would not apply to the AABD program. If commonwealth status prevailed, the existing program for needy aged, blind, or disabled persons would continue (unchanged) in Puerto Rico.

NUTRITION ASSISTANCE UNDER THE FOOD STAMP ACT

The current program in the States

The Food Stamp Program

Overview

The Food Stamp Act authorizes a food stamp program to increase the food purchasing power of needy households by granting them monthly allotments of food stamp coupons. With limited variations for Alaska and Hawaii, it operates under nationally uniform Federal rules.[2] Federal funds pay for the full cost of benefits and a bit more than half of total costs for administration, with no effective limit.[3]

Administration

Virtually all rules governing program operations are established by the Federal Government, and program operations and participation by food concerns accepting food stamp coupons are subject to extensive oversight by the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Food and Nutrition Service. Day-to-day administration (determination of eligibility and issuance of benefits) is the responsibility of State welfare agencies, following Federal rules.

Funding

Federal funding covers: (1) Federal administrative expenses for personnel, printing food stamp coupons, and oversight of welfare agency and food store operations, (2) the full cost of benefits, (3) half of day-to-day administrative expenses incurred by State agencies, (4) 75 percent of State agencies' costs for developing expanded computer capability, (5) 75 percent of costs incurred by States for fraud investigation and prosecution,[4] and (6) the full cost of implementing the systematic alien verification for entitlements (SAVE) program (procedures for using the Immigration and Naturalization Service to verify the immigration status of alien welfare applicants). In addition, the Federal Government pays the major portion of the cost of carrying out employment and training programs for food stamp recipients: each State receives a formula share of $75 million a year for basic operating costs, plus half of any operating expenses above those covered by the basic grant and half the cost of support services to participants (e.g., transportation and child care).

States are responsible for their share of food stamp adminstrative expenses (50 or 25 percent, depending on the type of expense) and, under the food stamp "quality control" system, are liable for fiscal sanctions if they have very high rates of erroneous eligibility and benefit determinations.

In FY 1989, Federal food stamp spending for the States is expected to total $12.9 billion. State costs are anticipated to be about $1.1 billion.

Eligibility for Assistance

In the food stamp program, households are determined eligible for aid under generally uniform provisions established in the Food Stamp Act.

Income. Most eligible households must have basic (gross) monthly income at or below 130 percent of the Federal poverty levels.[5] At present, the gross income limit for a four-person household is $1,263 a month. Almost all cash income received by a household is included when judging gross income eligibility.

Assets. Liquid assets of eligible households are limited to $2,000, or $3,000 for households with elderly members. Counted liquid assets do not include the value of the household's residence, business assets, a portion of the fair market value of any vehicle, and a number of other items.

Employment and training requirements. Nonworking able-bodied adults not caring for young children or enrolled in another program's work initiative must participate in State-designed employment and training programs in order to maintain their food stamp eligibility.

Categorical rules. Two classes of households are automatically eligible for food stamp assistance: those composed entirely of AFDC or SSI recipients. In certain other cases, households or individuals are automatically ineligible: households with members on strike, households where the head of household has voluntarily quit a job, postsecondary students (unless they are working or caring for a young child), illegal

[2] The regular food stamp program also operates in the District of Columbia, Guam, and the Virgin Islands, although more liberal benefit rules apply in Guam and the Virgin Islands.

Under the terms of the 1976 Covenant with the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands and implementing legislation, a variant of the food stamp program was negotiated with the Commonwealth and began operations in 1982. The Northern Marianas' program differs from the regular food stamp program primarily in that: (1) it is funded entirely by Federal money (benefits and administration), up to maximum annual grant of $3.7 million; (2) a portion of each household's food stamp allotment (25 percent) must be used to purchase locally produced food (coupons for local food items are differentiated by color); (3) maximum monthly benefits are about 20 percent higher than those in the regular food stamp program; and (4) income eligibility limits are about half those in the regular program.

[3] Although specific annual appropriation levels are authorized by the Food Stamp Act, they have never operated to actually limit necessary appropriations.

[4] States also may retain a portion of improperly issued benefits they recover (other than those caused by welfare agency errror).

[5] The "poverty levels" used for food stamp eligibility determinations in Alaska and Hawaii are higher than those used for other jurisdictions, by 25 and 15 percent, respectively. Although the requirement for gross income at or below 130 percent of Federal poverty levels is the basic income test, households with elderly or disabled members are subject to a more liberal test based on their counted (net) income (after reduction for various household expenses).

or temporarily resident aliens, persons living in institutional settings (except for specifically approved group living arrangements such as drug addiction programs and shelters for the homeless or battered women and children), and boarders (unless they apply together with the household providing board).

Between 18 and 19 million persons a month now participate in the food stamp program in the States, about 8 percent of the U.S. population.

Benefits

Eligible households receive monthly food stamp coupon allotments. These coupons are normally used to purchase food in participating stores and redeemed for dollars through banks and the Federal Reserve System, although they may be used to obtain prepared meals in some cases (e.g., in elderly nutrition projects, in shelters for the homeless) and nonfood items in other instances (e.g., hunting and fishing equipment in remote areas of Alaska). Allotments depend on a household's size, its counted (net) monthly income, and the program's maximum monthly benefit levels.

Food stamp maximum benefits are equal to an amount slightly higher than the cost of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's lowest estimate of the cost of an adequate diet, the "Thrifty Food Plan," adjusted for household size and indexed annually for food price inflation. They are standard for the 48 contiguous States, but significantly higher in Alaska and Hawaii (reflecting special surveys indicating substantially higher food prices). At present, the maximum monthly allotment for a four-person household is $300 in the 48 contiguous States, $382–$592 in Alaska (varying among urban and remote rural areas), and $457 in Hawaii.

Recipients' actual monthly benefits are calculated by subtracting 30 percent of their counted (net) monthly income from the maximum benefit for their household size. Food stamps then make up the difference between their expected contribution to food expenses (30 percent of counted income) and the amount judged sufficient to buy an adequate low-cost diet (the maximum benefit). Monthly food stamp benefits in the States now average $52 per person.

An important part of determining a household's benefits is the calculation of its counted income. When determining counted monthly income, basic (gross) income is reduced by applying a series of "deductions," including a "standard" deduction, specific deductions for certain living expenses (e.g., excessively high shelter costs), and a deduction for taxes and work expenses (20 percent of any earnings). These deductions average a bit over $200 a month, making the average household's counted income for food stamp benefit purposes about half its gross income.

Program Options

While the Food Stamp Act varies some eligibility and benefit rules for Alaska and Hawaii (higher income eligibility limits, maximum benefits, and allowable deductions), it allows States to make very few departures from Federal rules. States are permitted to operate "outreach" programs, vary specifically listed administrative rules (e.g., how changes in household circumstances are to be reported), and disregard a portion of child support payments in counting income (at their own cost). They also make most decisions as to the design of employment and training programs. Other variations can be achieved only as demonstration projects.

Nutrition Assistance in Puerto Rico [6]

Overview

The Food Stamp Act provides money for nutrition assistance in Puerto Rico under rules very different from those applied to the States. From early 1975 through June 1982, the regular food stamp program operated in the Commonwealth, albeit with some variations from standard rules.[7] Puerto Rico's food stamp program offered lower maximum benefits (about 5 percent less than in the 48 contiguous States, based on a special survey of food costs) and more limited income deductions (about half those in the regular program); however, income eligibility was based on the same Federal poverty levels used in the 48 States. At its peak, it assisted over 1.8 million persons each month, nearly 60 percent of the Commonwealth's population at the time, at an annual Federal cost of some $900 million. However, 1981 amendments to the Food Stamp Act directed that traditional food stamp assistance in the Commonwealth be ended and replaced with an annual "block grant" of Federal funds provided under the authority of the Food Stamp Act, effective July 1982. Today, the Food Stamp Act block grant to Puerto Rico represents about one-fifth of all Federal transfers to individuals in the Commonwealth and between 5 and 6 percent of personal income.[8]

Section 19 of the Food Stamp Act requires that the Federal Government pay Puerto Rico an annual grant, out of appropriations under the Act, to support the costs of nutrition assistance in the Commonwealth. Puerto Rico is given rein to design its own initiatives for nutrition assistance to needy persons, without reference to the Federal rules of the food stamp program. It has chosen to use this flexibility to establish a Nutrition Assistance Program (NAP) that differs significantly from the food stamp program. There are virtually no "strings" attached to the grant, other than a requirement that Puerto Rico share in the cost of administration, and the Commonwealth uses funds provided under the block grant both for its NAP and other activities (a cattle tick eradication project and wage subsidies to employers hiring NAP recipients).

Authorization of Federal funding for Puerto Rico under the Food Stamp Act expires September 30, 1990. Continuation of aid and the terms of that aid will be before Congress next year.

Administration

All rules governing operations using block grant funds are established by the Commonwealth. Although it must submit annual plans to the U.S. Department of Agriculture for approval, there are, for all practical purposes, no specific provisions of law that the Department can use to disapprove a plan. The Federal role is limited to approval of the Commonwealth's plan and the provision of funds.

Funding

Federal funds cover costs for carrying out any program(s) of nutrition assistance designed by the Commonwealth. However, to qualify for Federal money Puerto Rico must pay half of any administrative expenses it incurs, and total Federal support is limited to amounts specified in the Food Stamp Act (the annual block grants).

When originally enacted, the annual block grant was set at $825 million, with no provision for adjustment; this was a substantial reduction from the previous level of Federal support under the food stamp program and prevailed through FY 1986. In 1985 legislation, the annual grant amount was increased to: $852.75 million for FY 1987, $879.75 million for 1988, $908.25 million for 1989, and $936.75 million for 1990.[9]

Puerto Rico receives no special Federal cost-sharing for development of computer capability, fraud investigation and prosecution, employment and training activities, or carrying out a SAVE program. The Commonwealth is not liable for fiscal sanctions under the food stamp quality control system.

Eligibility for Assistance

Under Puerto Rico's NAP, eligiblity rules are simpler and significantly more restrictive than in the food stamp program. Income eligibility is based solely on basic (gross) monthly income, and limits are set at levels approximately half those now applied under the food stamp program in the 48 contiguous States (e.g., $667 vs. $1,263 a month for a four-person household). The liquid assest eligibility standard also is set well below the food stamp standard: $1,000 for all households. Income and asset eligibility standards have not changed since the advent of the NAP, while food stamp income limits are indexed for inflation and asset standards have been raised by legislation. Categorical elibility rules are generally not used.

Approximately 1.4 million persons a month receive benefits under the NAP, representing some 43 percent of the Commonwealth's population.

Benefits

Benefits in the NAP are issued monthly and calculated in much the same manner as in the food stamp program. However, they are issued in cash (checks), are slightly lower than average food stamp allotments, and can vary significantly from month to month even when household circumstances do not change.

To keep NAP costs within the annual block grant amount without adjusting eligibility criteria, Puerto Rico has chosen to vary maximum benefit levels monthly if necessary, and, as a result, the benefits participating households receive can differ from month to month. For example, in FY 1988, maximum monthly benefits for a four-person household varied from a high of $277 to a low of $233.[10] The expenditure of all block grant funds each year is ensured through the issuance of a 13th "bonus" benefit check in September.

Although maximum benefit levels are changeable and noticeably below those in the food stamp program, benefit determinations are similar in other respects. Households' benefits are calculated by subtracting 30 percent of counted monthly income from the applicable maximum benefit level. And, the counted income used to establish benefits is substantially less than each household's gross income: i.e., it is reduced by applying a series of deductions comparable to, although somewhat smaller than, those used in the food stamp program.

Because of substantially lower incomes in the Commonwealth (recipients are more likely to receive something close to the maximum benefit), NAP monthly average benefits are only slightly below the U.S. average food stamp benefit: in FY 1988, $49 vs. $50 per person. In effect, the Commonwealth has chosen to live within the amounts provided by the block grant primarily by freezing eligibility standards thereby reducing participation, rather than substantially reducing benefits. In 1988, the NAP provided $844 million in benefits; this represented an amount equal to approximately 20 percent of all personal consumption food expenditures in the Commonwealth.[11]

Program Options

Under the law governing Puerto Rico's block grant, virtually unlimited program design options are available. At present, the Commonwealth is exercising this flexibility primarily by providing NAP benefits, in cash, and using approximately $10 million a year to fund a cattle tick eradication project. It has also recently begun a pilot project using $15 million of its block grant funds to provide wage subsidies to certain employers hiring NAP recipients.

Overview

Section 213 of the substitute S. 712 requires that, on admission, the food stamp program apply to Puerto Rico as with any State. It also allows the Secretary of Agriculture, with the consent and agreement of the Governor of Puerto Rico, to "continue to obligate the amount of funds for which Puerto Rico becomes eligible under the food stamp program as a block grant rather than as coupons as a pilot program until October 1, 1997 unless otherwise provided by Congress."

With its admission, Puerto Rico would become a State under the food stamp program (see below for a specific discussion of the likely implications). Or, presumably, it could continue to receive a block grant of Federal funds, through September 1997, based on the likely cost of a food stamp program in Puerto Rico.[12] Continuation of the block grant form of aid would hinge on agreement by both the Secretary of Agriculture and the Governor of Puerto Rico. As such, it is not clear what the terms of the grant would be (i.e., whether Puerto Rico would continue to have the program design flexibility it now has and to what extent it might be required to share costs). The size of such a demonstration project grant would appear to depend on annual estimates of the Federal cost-share of running a full-fledged food stamp program in the Commonwealth. But, given the substantial differences between Puerto Rico's NAP and the food stamp program, this estimating procedure would be very difficult and, at least initially, costly.

Puerto Rico's inclusion as a State under the Food Stamp Act is not simply a matter of added Federal costs. While it would bring on a large increase in Federal moneys to the Commonwealth, it also would require that Puerto Rico operate its nutrition assistance program under the full panoply of Federal food stamp rules, thereby removing the important program design options it now enjoys. Moreover, because benefits would be issued in food stamp coupons, a sizable portion of Puerto Ricans' personal income would be required to be spent on food purchases, with uncertain effects on the Commonwealth's economy.

Administration

With extension of the food stamp program to Puerto Rico, substantial administrative changes would be in store both for the Commonwealth and the Federal Government. Puerto Rico would be subject to a wide range of Federal administrative rules and some new administrative costs. Puerto Rico's NAP generally operates under procedures for determining eligibility and issuing benefits that are simpler, and less costly, than would be the case under the food stamp program. At the least, new rules for processing applications, verifying eligibility factors, issuing benefits as coupon allotments rather than checks, operating employment and training programs, and quality control surveys would add significantly to administrative costs.[13] Puerto Rico's administration of the program might also come under much closer scrutiny than other States because of a provision in the Food Stamp Act requiring special audits by the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Inspector General whenever a State's food stamp caseload exceeds 60 percent of its population; this provision was almost triggered under Puerto Rico's pre-1982 food stamp program.

From the Federal perspective, statehood would bring on new administrative involvement related to printing and redeeming coupons and oversight of food stores and welfare agency operations.

Funding

Treating Puerto Rico as a State in the food stamp program would remove the current block grant limit on Federal financial support for nutrition assistance, and Federal funding would increase to cover whatever benefits were issued, a little over half of the Commonwealth's administrative costs, and new Federal expenses. Using experience under the pre-1982 food stamp program in Puerto Rico as a guide, annual Federal spending could increase by $300 million, or more, because of increased participation, higher benefits, and larger administrative costs. On the other hand, Puerto Rico would become liable to the Federal Government for quality control sanctions if its rate of erroneous eligibility and benefit determinations exceeded food stamp program "tolerance" levels.

Eligibility for Assistance

Possibly the most important change would be a substantial increase in the number of people eligible for, and presumably choosing to participate in, the new food stamp program. It is not unlikely that participation would grow by almost one-third to pre-1982 levels, adding some 400,000 persons to the caseload. Financial eligibility limits would be double those under the NAP, rising to 130 percent of the standard Federal poverty levels and approaching average family income in the Commonwealth. In the alter-

[12] The language of section 213 is a bit unclear in this respect since Puerto Rico (or any State) does not become "eligible" for any funds under the food stamp program, other than an entitlement to administrative cost-sharing amounts. Recipients become eligible.

[13] The U.S. Department of Agriculture's evaluation of the conversion to the NAP found an 18 percent reduction in administrative expenses. A portion of this reduction was due to a reduced caseload.

native, a separate set of food stamp income eligibility limits could be established for Puerto Rico, on the theory that the income poverty levels (on which food stamp eligibility standards are based) should reflect any substantial differences in living costs, as is now done for Alaska and Hawaii. These limits would probably be lower than those applied in the 48 contiguous States, but developing a separate set of poverty levels for Puerto Rico would not be a simple task and would raise a host of serious issues as to equity and whether the standard poverty levels used in the 48 States should be recalibrated and varied within 48 States.

Imposition of those food stamp eligibility rules that are more restrictive than under the NAP (e.g., some categorical rules) probably would have little effect, and the availability of new cash welfare assistance (e.g., the SSI program) if Puerto Rico becomes a State would only increase food stamp participation because of rules making most cash welfare recipients automatically eligible for food stamps.

Benefits

All benefits under Puerto Rico's food stamp program would have to be issued in coupons rather than cash. However, it is not clear what benefit levels would be, although they would be noticeably higher than under the NAP.

Under the most probable scenario, the standard maximum benefit and income deduction levels established for the 48 contiguous States would become those used in Puerto Rico. Maximum benefits in the NAP are, on average, roughly 15 percent lower than in the 48 States; income deduction levels are similarly smaller.

In a second scenario, special lower benefit and deduction levels, closer to those under the NAP, could be set for Puerto Rico, just as higher benefit and deduction levels are set for Alaska and Hawaii and as was the case when the food stamp program operated in Puerto Rico prior to the NAP. Pre-1982 maximum food stamp benefits in the Commonwealth were about 5 percent smaller than in the 48 States and deduction levels were about half.

In either case, average benefits would rise sharply, surpassing benefit levels in the rest of the country.

Other Considerations

Under the Food Stamp Act, States are not allowed to collect sales taxes on food stamp purchases if they wish to operate the food stamp program. To the extent Puerto Rico collects sales taxes on purchases now made with cash provided under the NAP, it would lose revenues.

Food stamps in Puerto Rico would both affect and be affected by other welfare program consequences of statehood. To some degree the new infusion of food stamp assistance might encourage Puerto Rico to hold down, or not embark on, expansion of its AFDC program, despite new Federal cost-sharing offered it as a State. Extension of the SSI program to Puerto Rico would limit additional food stamp costs because this new income to likely food stamp recipients would reduce their food stamp benefits.

Conversion to the NAP cash grants brought on an estimated 1-8 percent reduction in aggregate food expenditures.[14] And it would appear that conversion back to food stamp coupons usable only for food would increase food spending noticeably, might tie up an unacceptably high proportion of the Commonwealth's income in food purchases, and could have distorting effects on Puerto Rico's economy.

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under the nutrition assistance block grant or the food stamp program. Presumably, Federal funds used for the block grant would be included in the consolidated aid package that would be paid to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

Section 407 of the substitute S. 712 provides that certain Federal grant-in-aid programs may be consolidated with others. The Food Stamp Act block grant to Puerto Rico would not be covered by this provision. It is among those excluded because they are used to make "direct payments to classes of individuals." Instead, the Food Stamp Act's treatment of Puerto Rico would be left to future decisions by Congress, whether they be to continue the block grant approach or bring Puerto Rico back into the food stamp program.

SOCIAL SECURITY

The current program in the States

Program Description

Social security—the old-age, survivors, and disability insurance (OASDI) program—provides monthly benefits to retired and disabled workers and to their dependents and survivors. A worker gains eligibility for OASDI benefits through employment that is covered by the social security system. Employees of State and local governments are covered on a voluntary group basis.

Social security taxes are levied on covered employment and the revenues are credited to special trust funds. These trust funds are debited for payment of monthly benefits and administrative expenses of the program. Benefits are paid as a "earned right"—free from any test of need—and are loosely based of the level of career earnings covered by social security.

Cost and Recipients

Benefit payments in 1989 are expected to total $231 billion. There are approximately 38 million current social security beneficiaries.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Program Description

Basically, social security coverage and eligibility rules apply to Puerto Rico as they do to the United States generally. The Social Security Act generally defines a "State" and the "United States" to include Puerto Rico, as well as the Virgin Islands, Guam, the District of Columbia, and American Samoa. Employees of the Government of the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, who are treated the same as "State" employees, participate in social security.

An exception to the general applicability of benefits is what are called "special age-72 benefits," sometimes called "Prouty" benefits. These are special benefits, paid out of general revenues, for individuals (men who attained age 72 before 1972 and women who attained age 72 before 1970) who have worked in covered employment for less than the amount of time otherwise required. The law restricts these benefits to residents "of the 50 States," the Northern Mariana Islands, and the District of Columbia.

Cost and Participants

In 1987, the last year for which there are data, Puerto Rico had 553,000 social security beneficiaries. Their average monthly benefit was $303.80, compared to a national average of $488.10. In the aggregate, residents of Puerto Rico received $1.775 billion in social security benefit payments. The last year for which we have data on workers is 1985. In that year, 1,135,000 workers and their employers paid $1.1 billion in social security taxes (in the same year Puerto Rican residents recieved $1.64 billion in benefits).

Implications of statehood

Basically, statehood would bring no change from current law. However, special age-72 benefits might be extended to the few individuals who would be eligible if "the 50 States" were interpreted to include all States.

Clearly, establishing a new social security system and designing a transition from the current arrangement would be a major and fundamental undertaking. We know of no precedent that would pertain to this proposal. The nature of social security, as an "earned right" program that bases both the eligibility for benefits and their level on career earnings, would complicate the switch-over to a replacement system.

The substitute S. 712 requires the Joint Transition Commission to establish a Task Force on Social Security to negotiate agreements necessary for the coordination of the U.S. social security system with a similar system to be established in Puerto Rico. In the meantime, the bill stipulates that provisions of the U.S. social security program would continue to apply for 5 years after this referendum is certified. Similarly, "rights" of workers who are fully insured under the U.S. social security program as of 5 years after the certification are to be "protected."

The meaning of these provisions is unclear. For example, the nature of the "rights" to be retained by fully insured workers is uncertain. Are these rights to receive the same type and level of benefits as had already been earned under the U.S. social security programs, or to receive what they would have if they had remained in the U.S. program? Conceivably they could be simply the earnings credits earned under the U.S. system, transferred to the new Puerto Rican system. More important, it is unclear which system will pay these benefits. The task force apparently will have the discretion and bear the onus to resolve these and many other issues.

The wording that the Puerto Rican system should be "similar" to that of the U.S. may be a contraint, however. If it were construed that the new system must be virtually identical to the U.S. social security system, transition problems might be minimized, but there is a serious question whether an identical design would be suitable for Puerto Rico. For example, copying the current U.S. system's financing arrangements and benefit levels would probably be impractical. As shown above, Puerto Rico now receives approximately 50 percent more in benefits than it pays in social security taxes. This "subsidy" from the rest of the country presumably is caused by the redistributive features of social security, primarily its progressive benefit formula that replaces a higher proportion of earnings for low-income workers. Evenutally, the new Puerto Rican system probably would have to provide lower benefits or have a higher rate of taxation than under the current arrangement.

Financing implications make the method of transition from one system to another very sensitive. One scenario could be to continue payments from the U.S. social security program to all beneficiaries residing in Puerto Rico who were enrolled before independence. For workers, their credit for social security-covered employment might be transferred to a new Puerto Rican social security system, but from which system their payment of benefits would come is problematic. The Puerto Rican system could pay entirely for their benefits, or for only the proportion of the earnings career covered by it. Under either scenario, Puerto Rico would receive the advantage that social insurance systems usually have at their beginning—many workers contributing to support few beneficiaries, resulting in either low tax rates or surpluses in the initial years. This advantage would occur at the expense of the U.S. social security system, as it would lose all the tax revenue from Puerto Rico while continuing to pay benefits. Over time, however, this advantage would fade away as more and more benefit payments would be made by the Puerto Rican system. Eventually, when nearly all benefits would be paid out of the Puerto Rican program, the level of benefits would either have to be curtailed or taxes raised (assuming a pay-as-you-go system and rough balance between income and outgo).

An alternative approach could be similar to the way "totalization" agreements work with other countries. Under this scenario, benefits would be paid by the social security system under which most of an individual's work occurred.

Although Puerto Rico may receive a windfall from such approaches, eventually it would have to confront the structural imbalance its social security system would have if its financing arrangements and benefits levels were similar to the current U.S. program. As mentioned above, whatever the design of the new Puerto Rican system, eventually it probably would have to provide lower benefits or cost more than under the current arrangement.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

Enhanced commonwealth status for Puerto Rico would bring no apparent change from current law.

MEDICAID

The current program in the States

Medicaid, authorized by Title XIX of the Social Security Act, is a Federal-State matching program providing medical assistance to low-income persons. Each State designs and administers its own medicaid program, setting eligibility and coverage standards within broad Federal guidelines. Thus, there is considerable variation among the States in terms of eligibility requirements, range of services offered, limitations placed on those services, and reimbursement policies.

Program Description

Financing

The Federal share of expenditures for medicaid services in the States is tied to a formula inversely related to the square of a State's per capita income. For FY 1989, the Federal matching percentages range from 50 percent to 79.8 percent; no State may receive more than 83 percent. The matching rate for administrative costs is generally 50 percent for all States, with higher matching available for certain management and control activities. The remaining costs of the program are paid by the State; in some States local governments also contribute.

Eligibility

All States must cover the categorically needy. These include all persons receiving AFDC and, in most States, persons receiving SSI. Thirty-nine States and other jurisdictions also provide medicaid to the medically needy. These are persons whose income or resources exceed the standards for the cash assistance programs but who meet a separate medically needy financial standard established by the State and also meet the nonfinancial standards for categorical eligibility (such as age, disability, or being a member of a family with dependent children). Finally, Congress has recently extended medicaid coverage to certain target populations, using eligibility standards that are not directly linked to those used in the cash assistance programs. The Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988 (P.L. 100-360) requires States to phase in coverage of pregnant women, infants under 1 year old, and aged and disabled persons eligible for medicare with family incomes below 100 percent of the Federal poverty income guidelines. (Required coverage for the aged and disabled is restricted to medicare premiums and cost-sharing amounts and prescription drugs up to the new medicare drug deductible.)

Services

All States must cover a minimum set of services under medicaid and may offer additional services. For the categorically needy, the State must provide inpatient and outpatient hospital services, physican services, laboratory and X-ray, family planning, skilled nursing facility (SNF) services for those over age 21, and home health care for persons entitled to SNF care. The State must also provide early and periodic screening, diagnosis, and treatment (EPSDT), a preventive health program for persons under 21. Optional services include care in intermediate care facilities (ICFs), as well as such ancillary services as prescription drugs, dental care, and eyeglasses. Beneficiaries generally must be allowed to obtain services from any qualified provider.

Administration

Although each State administers its own medicaid program, there are some basic administrative standards with which States must comply. States are required to maintain a medicaid quality control (QC) system, which reviews the accuracy of eligibility determinations. Federal funding may be reduced if the State makes excessive errors in determining medicaid eligibility. Most States are also required to operate a medicaid management information system (MMIS), a standard claims processing and reporting system.

Cost and Participation

Medicaid will serve a projected 25 million low-income persons in FY 1989. Estimated total expenditures for medicaid during FY 1989 are $61 billion, of which the Federal share is $34 billion.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Program Description

The medicaid program in Puerto Rico operates under special Federal funding rules and is exempt from certain requirements relating to eligibility, service coverage, and program administration.

Financing

The Federal share in medicaid expenditures in Puerto Rico and other territories is fixed at 50 percent. Total Federal funding is subject to a cap: $76.2 million in FY 1989, and $79 million in FY 1990 and later years. As a result of the cap, Federal funds made up only 40 percent of program costs in FY 1986.

Eligibility

Puerto Rico is exempt from the new requirement that States phase in coverage of pregnant woman and infants. On the other hand, Puerto Rico has been permitted to establish medically needy income standards above the maximum ordinarily allowed. A State's medically needy standard may not exceed 133⅓ percent of the State's maximum AFDC payment amount for a family of the same size. In Puerto Rico, with a maximum AFDC payment of $90 per month, this would mean a medically needy income standard of $1,440 per year for a family of three. Instead, Puerto Rico's standard for a family of three in 1986 was $5,700. (There does not appear to be any statutory authority for this exception.) The medically needy accounted for 48 percent of Puerto Rico's medicaid beneficiaries in FY 1987, as opposed to 14 percent in the rest of the Nation.

Puerto Rico is also exempt from the requirement that it phase in coverage of medicare premiums and cost-sharing amounts for aged and disabled persons with incomes up to 100 percent of poverty. Puerto Rico could, at its option, pay premiums and cost-sharing for medicare beneficiaries who meet its current medicaid income and resource standards. However, it has opted not to do so. Possibly as a result, 35 percent of medicare Part A enrollees did not have Part B coverage in 1987.

Services

Puerto Rico is exempt from the requirement that beneficiaries be allowed to obtain services from any qualified provider. All services are provided through public hospitals and clinics. Medicare in Puerto Rico thus does not operate as a conventional insurance program, paying claims for specific services furnished to particular eligible individuals. Payment amounts to the participating public facilities are based on the facilities' budgets, with the medicaid share determined by comparing a sample of provider treatment records to medicaid eligibility listings.

Puerto Rico does not claim Federal financial participation for SNF, family planning, or home health services. These are mandatory services and are nominally included in Puerto Rico's State plan for medical assistance. Health Care Financing Administration (HCFA) officials are not certain they are actually being furnished.

Administration

Puerto Rico is exempt by statute from several rules relating to program administration. It is not subject to financial penalties under the medicaid QC system, nor is it required to operate an MMIS. As a result of these waivers, Puerto Rico is not subject to two of the basic control mechanisms used by the Federal Government in overseeing State medicaid programs. The absence of QC penalties has meant that there is no Federal review of the accuracy of eligibility determinations. (Puerto Rico does operate its own internal QC system, which has found eligibility errors in 20 to 30 percent of the cases reviewed.) The absence of an MMIS has meant that reliable information about program operations is unavailable.

Cost and Participation

In FY 1987, 1.7 million persons in Puerto Rico, or about half the population, were estimated to have received medicaid benefits. Total expenditures were an estimated $160 million, of which $63.4 million was covered by Federal payments. These figures may include expenditures for persons who do not qualify for medicaid under Federal rules.

Implications of Statehood

Medicaid in Puerto Rico would change dramatically in the event of statehood. Federal funding could more than double. At the same time, Puerto Rico would become subject to the minimum requirements, restrictions, and program control mechanisms applicable to the States. The current system under which medicaid amounts to a transfer of funds to public facilities, would be replaced by a system in which public and private providers would file claims for specific services to specific beneficiaries.

The following program changes would occur if Puerto Rico were treated like other States for medicaid purposes.

Financing

The cap on medicaid matching funds for Puerto Rico would be removed, and the Federal funding percentage would be computed under the current formula, which increases funding for States with lower per capita incomes. Puerto Rico's percentage would almost certainly be the maximum 83 percent permitted by law, as its median income is half that of the poorest State.[15] As a result of open-ended funding at a much higher matching rate, Federal funding would more than double from its FY 1987 level of 39.6 percent.

Eligibility

Puerto Rico would be subject to the new requirement that States phase in coverage of pregnant women and infants with incomes up to 100 percent of poverty. In addition, if its SSI payment levels were raised to the national standard, it would be required to furnish medicaid to any newly eligible SSI beneficiaries (many of these persons may already be covered as medically needy). On the other hand, Puerto Rico could no longer use a medically needy income standard in excess of 133⅓ percent of maximum AFDC payments. Unless its AFDC standards were increased significantly, many families with children could lose coverage. (The potential trade-offs here might change if Congress were to enact current proposals permitting or mandating coverage of children with higher family income levels.)

For all aged and disabled persons below poverty currently eligible for medicare, Puerto Rico would be required to pay the medicare Part B premium, deductibles, and coinsurance, as well as provide prescription drugs up to the catastrophic deductible limit. Puerto Rico also would be required to pay the Part a premium for any persons who are over age 65, have incomes below the poverty level, and are not automatically eligible for Part A because they are not insured under the social security system.

[15] If there were no 83 percent maximum, a State whose per capita income was half the national average would receive 88.75 percent matching. A State whose per capita income was one-third the national average (the situation of Puerto Rico) would receive 95 percent matching.

Services

Puerto Rico would be subject to the requirement that beneficiaries be allowed to obtain services from any qualified provider. Unlike the other associated territories, Puerto Rico has a substantial private medical care sector. For example, 30 percent of community hospital beds in 1987 were in private nonprofit facilities; another 34 percent were in proprietary hospitals. This is a higher proportion of privately owned beds than prevails in some States, such as Louisiana, Mississippi, or Oklahoma. Statehood could, then, mean a substantial shift in funds towards the private sector. One consequence might be that the public facilities would be less able to subsidize care of those low-income populations that would continue to be excluded from the medcaid program.

Medicaid law does permit waivers of the "freedom-of-choice" requirement to allow States to establish selective contacting systems. California and Illinois currently have such waivers, under which nonemergency hospital services are available only through specified contract providers. However, these providers are selected on the basis of price competition. It is not clear that current law would permit a system in which only public providers could participate.

Puerto Rico also would be required to make available the mandatory services that, while nominally covered under its current State plan, may not actually be available. These include SNF services, home health care, and family planning.

Administration

Puerto Rico would be subject to penalties under the medicaid QC system and would be required to operate an MMIS. These changes could result in a more rigorous eligibility application process and would also require the State to screen claims from providers, to insure that payment was made only for covered services to eligible individuals.

Implications for Scope and Cost of Program

In summary, statehood would bring an influx of new dollars to Puerto Rico's medicaid program. This benefit would be offset by requirements that Puerto Rico furnish more extensive coverage to some classes of individuals while cutting off coverage to some others. Medicaid funds might be shifted from public to private providers. Finally, stricter bureaucratic requirements could create barriers to access for many eligible persons.

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under the medicaid program. Presumably, Federal medicaid funds would be included in the consolidated aid package that would be provided to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Puerto Ricans who were U.S. citizens at the time of independence would retain U.S. citizenship in addition to Puerto Rican citizenship and have all the rights of U.S. citizens. This raises the question of whether Puerto Ricans might enter the United States in order to obtain medicaid coverage for health care services.

A dual citizen residing in the United States could qualify for medicaid if he or she met all the requirements for medicaid in the State in which he or she resided. A State may not require that applicants reside in the State for any minimum period before receiving medicaid. A person who enters the State with the intention of making it his or her permanent residence may receive medicaid benefits from that State at once. On the other hand, a person who enters the State expressly to obtain medical care is not eligible in that State. Thus, a resident of Puerto Rico who moved permanently to New York, or who declared the intention of remaining permanently, could qualify for New York medicaid. A person who went directly from Puerto Rico to a New York nursing home or hospital would not be eligible.

Under enhanced commonwealth status, Puerto Rico would be eligible for the grant consolidation option provided by section 501 of P.L. 95-134, which permits any department or agency to use simplified application and reporting procedures and waive matching funds requirements for assistance to "Insular Areas." Medicaid would be eligible for this treatment. It is a grant-in-aid program and does not make direct payments to classes of individuals. (A program which makes direct payments to individuals is not eligible for the simplified treatment.)

Implications for Scope and Cost of Program

Medicaid in Puerto Rico is already operating under simplified administrative procedures. Because of the cap on Federal funding, the Commonwealth is providing matching funds well in excess of the amount required by law. It is not clear that use of the section 501 option would make any real difference in medicaid operations or costs.

MEDICARE

The current program in the States

Program Description

Medicare provides health insurance protection for aged and disabled individuals. The program covers hospital services, physician services, and other medical services for all of those eligible, regardless of income. Medicare has two parts: hospital insurance (Part A) and supplementary medical insurance (SMI) (Part B).

Part A of medicare covers inpatient hospital care. In some cases, it also covers short-term skilled nursing facility care after a hospital stay, home health agency visits, and hospice care. Part A is financed chiefly from hospital insurance payroll taxes. A small number of persons over age 65 are not entitled to medicare because they are not eligible for social security or railroad retirement benefits; these persons may enroll under Part A by paying a monthly premium.

Medicare pays for inpatient hospital services according to a prospective payment system (PPS). Under this system, each medicare patient is classified according to his or her medical condition into diagnosis-related groups (DRGs). Hospitals are paid a predetermined rate for each patient treated within a given DRG. Hospitals with costs below the payment rate are allowed to keep the surplus, while hospitals with costs above the payment rates must absorb the loss.

Part B is a voluntary program; individuals must enroll and pay a premium to receive benefits. All persons entitled to Part A and all persons over age 65 are eligible to enroll. The program covers the services of physicians, outpatient hospital care, laboratory and X-ray services, and other related medical services and supplies. The program is financed by beneficiary premiums and general revenues. The monthly premium ($27.90 plus $4 for catastrophic coverage in 1989) accounts for about 25 percent of program costs. Medicare generally pays 80 percent of the reasonable charges for covered services, after the beneficiary has met the $75 annual deductible. The beneficiary is liable for 20 percent of the reasonable charge, an amount known as coinsurance. Beneficiaries with sufficient taxable income are also subject to a supplementary premium collected through the Federal income tax system.

Cost and Participation

Medicare outlays for FY 1989 are estimated to be $86.9 billion ($98.6 billion in outlays, offset by $11.7 billion in premiums and collections).

The current program in Puerto Rico

Program Description

For medicare purposes, Puerto Rico is treated like any State, with two exceptions.

First, hospitals in Puerto Rico are reimbursed for inpatient services under a special prospective payment system (PPS) distinct from the PPS used for hospitals in the States. The standard medicare PPS establishes three basic national hospital payment rates, for hospitals in large urban areas, other urban areas, and rural areas. These basic rates are adjusted through a wage index to reflect relative labor costs in different areas. For each case, the applicable adjusted rate is multiplied by a weighting factor reflecting the classification of the case into one of 477 DRGs. The product represents the basic DRG payment for the case.[16]

Puerto Rico's system works essentially the same way, except that separate large urban, other urban, and rural rates are established for Puerto Rico hospitals. These represent a blend of an average national rate (25 percent) and rates based on historical costs for Puerto Rico hospitals alone (75 percent). The FY 1989 blended rate for hospitals in San Juan is 29 percent lower than the rate that would apply in a mainland city of the same size with the same relative wage levels.[17]

Second, because Puerto Ricans do not pay Federal income tax, they do not pay the supplemental income-related premium established by the Medicare Catastrophic Coverage Act of 1988 (P.L. 100-360). They do pay the flat rate catastrophic premiums established by the Act, but at lower rates than citizens of the States.

Cost and Participation

In 1987, 406,000 Puerto Ricans were enrolled in medicare Part A, and 263,000 were enrolled in Part B. Data on medicare expenditures by residence of the beneficiary are not available.

Implications of statehood

Inpatient Hospital Reimbursement

The substitute version of S. 712 provides that, after statehood, medicare would operate the same way in Puerto Rico as in other States.

Under statehood, Puerto Rico hospitals would be paid under the national PPS. Revenues would rise by something less than the current 29 percent differential, because the inclusion of Puerto Rico in the averages on which the national rates are based would reduce those rates for all hospitals. Still, Puerto Rico hospitals would be paid considerably more, relative to their costs, than hospitals in the States. However, the substitute version of S. 712 also provides that "reimbursements under medicare shall not exceed the actual cost of providing equivalent health care to the levels of care provided in the several contiguous States." This provision is ambiguous. It is not clear whether the restriction is on individual payments to providers for each patient treated or on the aggregate amount of payments to all providers in Puerto Rico. If the restriction applied to individual payments, the effect would be a system under which a hospital would receive the lesser of its actual costs for a given case or the national PPS rate for that case. This would probably result in financial losses for hospitals.[18] If the restriction applied to aggregate payments, the effect would be to maintain the current system of separate rates based on historic Puerto Rico costs. (An alternative way of achieving the same goal would be to provide that the provisions of section 1886(d)(9) of the Social Security Act would continue in effect after statehood.)

Part B Enrollment

One feature of Puerto Rico's medicaid program has an indirect effect on eligibility for medicare benefits. Other States' medicaid programs pay medicare premiums and cost-sharing for low-income aged and disabled persons; Puerto Rico's does not. This may have contributed to the fact that in Puerto Rico enrollment under Part B is 35 percent lower than Under Part A. If Puerto Rico were a State, it would be required to pay Part B premiums for all medicare beneficiaries with incomes below 100 percent of poverty. This could mean Part B eligibility for most of the 140,000 Part A eligibles not currently enrolled under Part B.

Catastrophic Premiums

As statehood would mean imposition of standard U.S. income tax rules, medicare beneficiaries who had Federal tax liability would be liable for the income-based catastrophic supplemental premium.[19] Relatively few beneficiaries would be affected. However, the flat rate catastrophic premiums would also be charged at the rates prevailing in the States, rather than at the special lower rates established for Puerto Rico. This would have an impact on the medicaid program, which probably would be paying the premiums for most beneficiaries.

Implications for Scope and Cost of Program

The major impact of statehood would be a significant increase in the number of Part B enrollees, resulting in added costs for both the Federal and Puerto Rican governments. Depending on the interpretation of the restriction on hospital payments, Part A costs could be reduced or remain the same.

The substitute version of S. 712 provides that, in the event of independence, the Joint Transition Commission will establish a task force to negotiate the coordination of medicare and a similar system to be established by Puerto Rico. At the same time, the bill includes medicare among the programs for which Federal funding would be replaced by a categorical grant to Puerto Rico for 9 years after the referendum. The grant amount would be based on an estimate of "the total amount of grants, programs, and services, including Medicare, provided by the Federal Government in Puerto Rico."

The amount "provided" by the Federal Government for medicare could be defined broadly to mean the total annual outlays for covered services, including outlays from the medicare trust funds. More narrowly, the amount "provided" could mean the Federal general fund contribution to Part B costs (approximately 75 percent). The first meaning is difficult to reconcile with the provision for ongoing coordination between medicare and a similar system to be established by the new nation. This coordination is presumably required in order to protect the vested rights of Puerto Ricans who have contributed to the Part A trust fund. Replacement of total medicare expenditures by a short-term categorical grant would not address this issue. For the purpose of the following discussion, it will be assumed that the second, narrower meaning is intended: that only the Federal general fund contribution to Part B would be replaced by a temporary grant. In this scheme, Part B (the pay-as-you-go component of medicare) would be wholly replaced by a Puerto Rican system immediately after independence, with temporary continuation of U.S. support. The transition between Part A (the vested social insurance component of medicare) and a Puerto Rican system would be more gradual.

The Part A transition would present some of the same issues raised elsewhere in this memorandum with respect to social security. As with social security, there appear to be at least three basic transition options:

The portion of the Part A trust fund attributable to Puerto Rican contributions would be turned over to the new system, which would provide benefits to both current medicare beneficiaries and to insured persons not yet receiving benefits.

Current beneficiaries would continue to be covered by medicare, while contributions for those not yet covered would be transferred to the new Puerto Rico program.

Current beneficiaries would continue to be covered by medicare, while responsibility for those not yet covered would be established under a "totalization" approach. That is, an individual would be enrolled in either the U.S. or the Puerto Rico system, depending on which system the individual had contributed to for the greater part of his or her working life.

The first approach could create an immediate financial problem for the new Puerto Rican system if this system provided a level of benefits comparable to those available under medicare. As with social security, medicare benefits paid in Puerto Rico are probably in excess of the contributions made by lower-income Puerto Rican workers. The benefits for current enrollees are subsidized from the contributions made by higher-paid workers in the States. This subsidy would be lost after independence.

The second two approaches both involve continued direct entitlement to medicare for current beneficiaries. These approaches are complicated by the fact that medicare provides health benefits instead of simple cash payments.

Under current law, medicare does not pay for services outside the United States and its possessions. This rule could be changed [16] This payment may be further adjusted for cases with very high costs or long stays (outliers); additional payments are made to teaching hospitals and those treating a disproportionate share of low-income patients.

[17] This estimate applies the San Juan wage index of .5369 to the labor-related components of the blended and national rates respectively. Before the wage adjustment, the Puerto Rico and national rates are $2,641.64 and $3,215.17, 21 percent apart. The gap widens after the wage adjustment because a higher proportion of the Puerto Rico rate is considered to be labor-related.

[18] The effect would be similar to that of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act (TEFRA) of 1982 payment limitations in effect before the adoption of PPS, under which hospitals could suffer a loss but never realize a profit.

[19] These payments, like other income tax receipts, would be returned to Puerto Rico in the form of a transitional statehood grant through 1995.

to allow continued coverage for current beneficiaries in Puerto Rico. The effect, however, would be that Puerto Rican hospitals, physicians, and other providers would be subject to extensive regulation by an agency of a foreign country. Strictly speaking, medicare does not regulate providers; it sets forth conditions under which it will purchase services rendered to its enrollees. In this sense, HCFA rules affecting Puerto Rico providers would be no different from the specifications any other agency might impose in buying goods or services from a foreign supplier. Still, medicare regulations (specially certification requirements) can have such a pervasive impact on their providers that their continued imposition could be perceived as compromising Puerto Rican independence.

An alternative is to pay Puerto Rico to furnish continued coverage to current medicare beneficaries, presumably under the same system it would develop for vested future beneficiaries. Although the structure of this system cannot be predicted, it is not certain that Puerto Rico would choose to operate one health care system for medicare beneficaries and another for the rest of its citizens. It might instead choose to treat its medicare payments as one funding source for a general national health care system. This might have two consequences. First, the vested "right" to medicare might be replaced by access to a health care system of public hospitals and clinics comparable to that currently available to Puerto Rico's medicaid population. Second, the entire Puerto Rican national system might be disproportionately dependent on the U.S. contribution for a small sector of its enrolled population. As the current medicare population died off, other funding sources would have to be found.

Implcations of enhanced commonwealth status

Enhanced commonwealth status would bring no apparent change from current law.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The current program in the States

The unemployment compensation (UC) system provides short-term income assistance to unemployed workers through a State-operated system created by Federal tax incentives. The Federal Unemployment Tax Act (FUTA) and Titles III, IX, and XII of the Social Security Act provide the framework for the system. Its major objectives are to: (1) provide temporary relief through partial wage replacement for unemployed workers who demonstrate a strong labor force attachment; and (2) help stabilize the national economy automatically by increasing net public spending during recessions and increasing taxation during periods of economic growth.

The Federal-State structure of UC places responsibility on the States for program details based on broad Federal guidelines. State laws determine individual eligibility, benefit amount, benefit duration, and disqualification provisions. Federal law requires State programs to cover certain types of employment.

Benefits are funded by State payroll taxes on employers. State tax revenue funds the payment of regular UC benefits and half of the extended benefits (EB) program. State UC laws determine the tax structure of the program, and States collect the revenue from employers. This revenue is deposited with the U.S. Treasury and credited to individual State accounts within the Unemployment Trust Fund. It is counted as Federal revenue in the budget. Funds are made available to States as needed for benefit payments, and the State accounts are charged for this Federal reimbursement of their benefit expenditures.

The FUTA imposes a 6.2-percent gross Federal tax rate on employers for the first $7,000 in wages paid to each covered employee. In States with federally approved programs and no outstanding Federal loans for the program, employers are given a tax credit reduction of up to 5.4 percentage points against the 6.2-percent tax liability. Thus, employers pay a net FUTA tax rate of 0.8 percent. FUTA tax revenue is used to fund the administrative costs of UC, the Federal half of EB, and loans to State programs that become insolvent.

The system covers about 85 percent of all employed persons in 53 "State" programs (the 50 States plus the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands). During FY 1989, the U.S. Department of Labor estimates that $13.6 billion will be paid to 6.9 million beneficiaries and that benefits will average $148 weekly.

The current program in Puerto Rico

The UC program in Puerto Rico operates on the same legal basis as the programs in the States. Puerto Rico's UC program has several unusual characteristics. For example, while the regular benefit period can last up to 26 weeks in most States, Puerto Rico has a 20-week period. Most States set an employer's tax rate based on the firm's experience with unemployment, but Puerto Rico does not use this "experience-rating" approach to taxation. Puerto Rico's maximum weekly benefit amount of $110 is the lowest in the system.

During the first calendar quarter of 1989, Puerto Rico had an unemployment rate of 14.7 percent, higher than that of any State. There were 31,000 UC beneficiaries in Puerto Rico during the quarter, and the cost of their benefits during the 3 months was $23.4 million.

Implications of statehood

Since Puerto Rico already operates a UC program on the same basis as the States, no change in the existing program would be needed should Puerto Rico become a State.

Implications of independence

If Puerto Rico should become independent, the UC program would no longer exist as a component of the Federal-State system. However, there would be several issues to resolve with respect to a transfer of program assets to Puerto Rico and the rights of current beneficiaries and covered employees. The pending legislation as drafted is silent on these transitional issues.

First, Puerto Rico has credits in its Unemployment Trust Fund account for revenues collected from Puerto Rico employers against which charges for benefit payments have not been levied. As of March 31, 1989, Puerto Rico's account balance was $448.4 million. An independent Puerto Rico would probably ask that this balance, reduced by any further benefit payments that might be made after independence for entitlements earned before independence, be paid by the United States to the Republic of Puerto Rico.

Second, FUTA revenues are held in reserve in three Federal trust fund accounts to pay future administrative costs, EB payments, and loans to State programs. An independent Puerto Rico could argue that it should receive its share of these reserves since it would have no future claim against these accounts. Puerto Rico's share would presumably be determined by the proportion of national FUTA revenues that were collected from Puerto Rican employers over the months prior to independence. As of March 31, 1989, FUTA reserves totaled $8.2 billion. Puerto Rico's share of FUTA revenue collections was 0.6 percent during FY 1987.

A final independence issue concerns entitlement of the Puerto Rican unemployed to benefits. Benefits could be continued after independence for the unemployed already in beneficiary status. Also, new benefit claims could be allowed for persons who became unemployed after independence, but only for job loss associated with a base period of employment that occurred before independence. Puerto Rico's base period is the first four of the last five completed calendar quarters before the claim filing date. Benefits paid after independence would be charged against Puerto Rico's trust fund account.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

The proposed referendum does not call for any change in the status of the US system in Puerto Rico under commonwealth status. Presumably, UC could not be included in a consolidated block grant since it provides direct payments to individuals.

EARNED INCOME TAX CREDIT

The current program in the States

The earned income tax credit (EITC) is a refundable tax credit authorized under the U.S. Internal Revenue Code as a part of the individual income tax. Eligible tax filers may use these credits to reduce their Federal income tax liability. If a filer's credit entitlement exceeds tax liability, the balance of the credit amount is "refunded," or paid directly, to the filer by means of a check from the U.S. Treasury. An individual who anticipates being eligible for EITC can have the employer take it into account in determining tax withholding from wages. Anticipated eligibility for an EITC refund can result in an increased pay check (i.e., negative tax withholding) for employees who take advantage of the withholding process.

To be eligible for EITC, a filing unit must have earned income and a dependent child residing in the household. The credit is currently worth 14 percent of the first $6,500 of yearly family earnings. The $910 maximum credit is reduced by 10 cents for each dollar of adjusted gross income (AGI) over $10,240. Thus, the credit phases out for families with AGI of $19,340 or more.

The EITC first took effect in 1975. The credit amount and phaseout income level have been increased several times since the original enactment and are now adjusted annually for price inflation. Credits earned in 1989, and generally paid in 1990, are projected to total $5.4 billion. They will go to 9.8 million families, or about one-third of all U.S. families with children.

Legislation to expand EITC is pending before Congress. The Senate has passed legislation (S. 5), and the House Ways and Means Committee is marking up a bill. Since President Bush is supporting this type of legislation, it is possible that EITC will be expanded by the 101st Congress.

The current program in Puerto Rico

The EITC generally is not available to families in Puerto Rico. Persons living in Puerto Rico year-round are exempt from Federal income taxes and pay only the Puerto Rican income tax. They are ineligible for EITC because their income is exempt from the U.S. tax system. Puerto Ricans with U.S. earnings who reside part-time in the States and file U.S. tax returns also are ineligible for EITC because EITC is available only for persons whose tax returns cover a 12-month period. (However, U.S. Government employees residing in Puerto Rico are subject to the U.S. income tax, and some are eligible for EITC.)

Puerto Rico has begun a demonstration of a wage subsidy using funds from the nutrition assistance program. This subsidy, intended to encourage low-income family heads to work, will pay 25 percent of the Federal minimum wage for up to 40 hours of work per week. While similar to the EITC, this demonstration project will spend only $14 million in FY 1989, a small fraction of the potential cost of EITC in Puerto Rico.

Puerto Rican statehood would bring its residents under the U.S. income tax. Thus, eligibility for EITC would be available to all working Puerto Ricans parents with dependent children who meet the income test.

The impact of this eligibility extension on the cost of EITC to the Federal Government and on the Puerto Rican economy could be substantial. The most recent individual income data for Puerto Rico are from the last decennial census and thus are dated. However, a conservative estimate of how many Puerto Rican families would have been covered in 1979 had today's EITC been available to them at the same real dollar levels shows that about 295,000 families would have been eligible. This group would have amounted to 65 percent of all Puerto Rican families with children in that year. If Puerto Rican families would have had an average credit similar to that for the United States as a whole ($552), the cost of these benefits would have been $163 million in today's dollars, which would raise the total cost of EITC for 1989 by 3 percent. These additional cash payments would not be taken into account in determining AFDC benefit amounts for families under that program under a law that takes effect October 1, 1989. EITC payments would also be ignored in most cases in the determination of benefit amounts under Puerto Rico's nutrition assistance program.

Implications for independence

The EITC would not be available in Puerto Rico under independence. Although Puerto Rican residents could elect U.S. citizenship at the time of independence, the denial of EITC eligibility to Federal tax filers who exclude income earned in a U.S. possession or a foreign country would continue to apply, thereby eliminating Puerto Rican residents from EITC.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

The proposed enhancement of commonwealth status would not affect the U.S. tax code. Thus, EITC would continue to be unavailable to Puerto Ricans.

MATERNAL AND CHILD HEALTH SERVICES BLOCK GRANT

The current program in the States

Program Description

The maternal and child health (MCH) services block grant, authorized under Title V of the Social Security Act, provides grants to each State and insular area to meet a broad range of health services, including preventive, primary care, and habilitative services, to mothers and children. Funds are allocated among the States on a percentage formula based on the FY 1981 funding levels for the programs that were combined into the block grant when it was created in FY 1982. In addition, 15 percent of the funds appropriated for the block grant each year are set-aside for special projects of regional and national significance (SPRANS) in the categories of research, training, hemophilia, genetic diseases, and maternal and child health improvement, including infant mortality and efforts relating to children with special health care needs.

States determine eligibility criteria for MCH services. The law provides that block grant funds are to be used to assure access of mothers and children, "particularly those with low income or limited access to health services," to quality health services. Low-income mothers and children are those with family income below 100 percent of Federal poverty guidelines. States determine the level of services provided under the block grant, including prenatal care, well-child care, dental care, immunization, family planning, and vision and hearing screening services. Services may also include inpatient services for children with special health care needs, screening services for lead-based paint poisoning, and counseling for parents of sudden infant death syndrome victims. In order to receive their MCH block grant allocations, States are required to match each $4 in Federal funds with $3 of their own.

Program Operation

In FY 1989, a total of $554,268,000 was appropriated for the MCH block grant. Of this amount, $465,293,000 was allocated in grants to the States, and $88,975,000 was distributed in SPRANS project grants to 490 grantees. The MCH program does not have the authority to collect uniform data from the States on the number of program recipients, although some States do submit such information in annual reports on program operation.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Program Description

For the purposes of the MCH block grant, Puerto Rico is treated as a State, and the program operates as in the 50 States. The program is administered by Puerto Rico's Department of Health.

Program Operation

In FY 1987, the most recent year for which such data are available, Puerto Rico received an MCH allocation of $11.5 million. For this, it was required to spend $8.6 million in matching funds, but it actually spent $14.4 million of its own funds on its MCH program.[20] In FY 1987, the Puerto Rico MCH program served 40,717 prenatal patients through 237,756 clinic visits. That year the program also served 8,881 postpartum patients. A total of 46,127 infants, 39,876 preschool children, and 57,586 school-age children and adolescents received comprehensive health services. Neonatal intensive care was provided for 499 infants, and 18,867 children with special health care needs received services through 123,000 health visits. In addition, 42,676 women received family planning services.[21]

[20] FY 1987 program expenditure data are from: Public Health Foundation. Public Health Agencies 1989: An Inventory of Programs and Block Grant Expenditures. Washington, 1989.

[21] Information on clients served obtained in telephone conversation July 24, 1989, with spokesman of Division of Maternal and Child Health, Health Resources and Services Administration, U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Implications of statehood

Since Puerto Rico is treated as a State for purposes of the MCH block grant, a change in the Commonwealth's status to a State apparently would have no effect on this program.

Implications of independence

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for a share of the MCH block grant as currently authorized. Presumably, Federal MCH funds would be included in the aid package that would be provided to Puerto Rico to replace Federal funds for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

Section 407 of the substitute S. 712 provides, under enhanced commonwealth status, for the consolidation in any fiscal year or years of certain Federal grant-in-aid programs available to Puerto Rico, with certain exceptions. The consolidated grant would be at least equal to the sum of grants to which the Commonwealth would otherwise be entitled under the separate programs. The consolidated grant would be for the programs and purposes authorized under any of the grants consolidated, but the Commonwealth would determine how the funds should be allocated. Regulations would be published covering the application and reporting process, and the Federal administering authority would be required to waive any requirements for matching funds.

Enhanced commonwealth status and the resulting of grants-in-aid could have implications for the MCH block grant. This provision does not specifically exclude the MCH block grant, so, presumably, Puerto Rico could (but would not be required to) request the funds under this program be included in a consolidated grant. In such a case, Puerto Rico would receive the same amount of funds it would otherwise be eligible to receive under the MCH block grant, but could use these funds for other purposes. The possible elimination of separate application and report requirements could reduce administrative costs to the Commonwealth and make more funds available for program services. The elimination of requirements for matching funds could allow the Commonwealth to reduce its own spending for maternal and child health services activities. As seen above, Puerto Rico currently spends more of its own funds for such activities than is required by the matching provisions of the MCH block grant authorizing legislation.

TITLE IV-B CHILD WELFARE SERVICES

The current program in the States

The child welfare services program provides 75 percent Federal matching grants to States for a variety of services intended to protect the welfare of children. The services are to address problems that could result in neglect, abuse, exploitation or delinquency of children; prevent the unnecessary separation of children from their families and restore them to their families when possible; place children in adoptive homes if restoration is not possible; and assure adequate foster care when children cannot be returned home or placed for adoption.

The FY 1989 appropriation for child welfare services is $246.7 million. These funds are allotted to States according to a formula that takes into account the size of the State's population that is under age 21 and the ratio of per capita income in the State to per capita income in all the States and territories. States with lower per capita incomes have higher per capita allotment percentages than States with higher per capita incomes, although a minimum is set for higher income States and a maximum applies to low-income States. States (including Puerto Rico) receive their share of funds appropriated in excess of $141 million only if they have implemented specified protections for children in foster care. There are minimal reporting requirements under the program and there are no reliable national or State data on the use of funds, including services provided or persons served.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Puerto Rico is considered a State for the purposes of this program. Funding is allocated on the basis of the population under age 21, but the allotment percentage for Puerto Rico is set at the maximum allotment level rather than on the basis of actual per capita income. In addition, Puerto Rico is not eligible for a share of funds appropriated in excess of $141 million because it has not implemented the specified protections for children in foster care. In FY 1989, Puerto Rico received $6.5 million under this program.[22] Information on the use of funds under this program is not available.

Implications of statehood

Puerto Rico would receive funds on the same basis as other States under this option. This would mean that Pureto Rico's allotment percentage would be based on actual per capita income rather than being assumed to be at the cap. However, Puerto Rico's allotment percentage (and funding under the Title IV-B program) would remain the same based on its current per capita income. Per capita annual income in Puerto Rico is estimated to be less than one-third the U.S. per capita income.[23] The allotment for Puerto Rico could not increase on the basis of statehood, because its allotment percentage already is the highest permitted under the law.

Implications of Independence

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under Title IV-B. Presumably, funding for the Title IV-B program would be included in the aid package to replace Federal programs provided to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

The substitute S. 712 would allow Federal agencies to consolidate grants made to Puerto Rico (other than those used for direct payments to classes of individuals) to minimize application and reporting requirements. The consolidated grant could be used for the purposes authorized under any of the consolidated programs. The grant amount would be at least equal to the sum of grants to which the Commonwealth would otherwise be entitled. Presumably, the administering authority would waive the requirements for matching funds. The Title IV-B program is not specifically treated as an exception under the bill. Hence, Puerto Rico presumably could (but would not be required to) request that the funds under this program be included in a consolidated grant. In this case, Puerto Rico would receive the same amount of funds it received under Title IV-B (e.g., $6.5 million) but could use these funds for other purposes. (It could also use other funds for child welfare.) Incentive to consolidate the child welfare services program with others would include reductions in paperwork requirements (the elimination of multiple applications and reporting) and the possibility that the matching funds requirements would be lifted. If the consolidation of Title IV-B were not requested, Puerto Rico presumably would continue to receive funds as outlined under current law.

TITLE IV-E FOSTER CARE AND ADOPTION ASSISTANCE

The current program in the States

The Title IV-E foster care program provides open-ended Federal matching funds to States for maintenance payments made for AFDC-eligible children in foster care. The program is required of all States participating in AFDC (all States do). The Federal matching rate for a given State is that State's medicaid matching rate, which averages about 53 percent nationally. States may also claim open-ended Federal matching (50 percent) for their administrative costs and (75 percent) for training costs. States have up to 2 years to make claims for expenditures under the IV-E foster care program; thus, the actual funding for FY 1988 and FY 1989 is still in flux. The FY 1989 appropriation for foster care is $1.023 billion (which includes funds for prior years' expenses). The Administration estimates the FY 1989 costs for the IV-E foster care program to be $1.03 billion. It is estimated that 123,000 children participated in the program on an average monthly basis in FY 1988.

The Title IV-E adoption assistance program provides Federal matching payments to States for adoption assistance payments made to parents who adopt AFCD- or SSI-eligible children with special needs; and for the one-time adoption expenses of parents of special needs children whether or not they are AFDC- or SSI-eligible. The Federal matching rate for the open-ended adoption assistance payments for a given State is that State's medicaid matching rate. States may also claim open-ended Federal matching for their administrative costs (50 percent) and for their training costs (75 percent). States may claim up to 50 percent Federal matching for the one-time adoption expenses, up to a maximum of $2,000 total for each placement. As in the Title IV-E foster care program, States have up to 2 years to make claims for expenditures under the adoption assistance program; thus, the actual funding for FY 1988 and FY 1989 is still in flux. The FY 1989 appropriation for the adoption assistance program is $111.7 million (which includes money for prior years' expenditures). The Department of Health and Human Service estimates the FY 1989 costs for the IV-E adoption assistance payments to be $111.7 million. It is estimated that the average monthly number of children participating in the program in FY 1989 was 38,000.

The current program in Puerto Rico

The Administration indicates that Puerto Rico does not currently receive funding under the Title IV-E programs, although it is included in the definition of State and would presumably be eligible for funds within the section 1108 cap as described in this memo under the Title IV-A AFDC program. As noted in that description, Puerto Rico is eligible for up to $82 million in FY 1989 for total expenditures under several programs including Titles IV-A and IV-E.

Implications of statehood

Effective on the date of admission to statehood, Puerto Rico would receive funds on the same basis as other States. If, like the other States, Puerto Rico were not subject to the cap on expenditures for programs specified under section 1108, it would be more likely to claim reimbursement for its foster care and adoption expenses under Title IV-E. As noted above, these are generally open-ended reimbursements for the costs of serving eligible children, based on the States' medicaid matching rate.

Implications of Independence

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under the Title IV-E program. Presumably, all Title IV-E funds would be included in the consolidated aid package provided to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

This option would allow Federal agencies to consolidate grants made to Puerto Rico, other than those for direct payments to classes of individuals. Because the Title IV-E foster care and adoption assistance programs provide funding for direct payments to classes of individuals, they probably could not be consolidated under this option. However, this could be subject to legal interpretation. Currently, Puerto Rico does not receive funds under these programs.

TITLE XX SOCIAL SERVICES BLOCK GRANTS

The current program in the States

Title XX is an appropriated entitlement that provides Federal funds as block grants to States to support a variety of social services, with no State matching required. Funds are allotted to States on the basis of their share of total population in the 50 States and the District of Columbia. There are minimal reporting requirements under the program and there are no reliable national or State data on how funds are spent, including services provided or persons served. However, annual preliminary plans submitted by the States indicate the range of services provided. In FY 1987, the service category provided by the largest number of States was home-based services (including homemaker and home health services), followed by day care for children; protective or emergency services for children; employment, education and training services and protective and emergency services for adults. A variety of other services were also provided. The FY 1989 appropriation for the Title XX program is $2.7 billion.

The current program in Puerto Rico

Puerto Rico's annual allotment of Title XX funds is based on the ratio of the funds Puerto Rico received in FY 1981 to total Title XX funds. In addition, Puerto Rico may use funds for the Title XX program that are not expended within the cap specified under section 1108 (described in the section of this memo on Title IV-A AFDC). The FY 1989 allotment under Title XX for Puerto Rico is $14 million. Puerto Rico reported that it planned to use its Title XX funds in FY 1987 for case management; counseling; day care for children and adults; disabled services; employment, education and training services; home-based services; residential care and treatment; and social support services.

[22] U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, Office of Human Development Services, Administration on Children, Youth and Families.

Implications of statehood

The substitute S. 712 provides that Title XX would operate in Puerto Rico as it currently does in the 50 States. If Puerto Rico received Title XX funds under the same formula that applies to other States—on the basis of population—its Title XX funding would be likely to increase substantially. For example, the State of Connecticut, which has a population roughly equivalent in size to Puerto Rico, receives $36 million in Title XX funds in FY 1989, compared with Puerto Rico's allotment of $14 million. Presumably, the additional funds that might be available for Title XX under the cap specified in section 1108 would not be available under this option.

Implications of independence

Puerto Rico as an independent nation would not be eligible for Federal funds under Title XX. Presumably, Federal Title XX funds would be included in the consolidated aid package that would be provided to Puerto Rico for several years after the proclamation of independence.

Implications of enhanced commonwealth status

The substitute S. 712 would apply the provisions of P.L. 95-134, relating to consolidation of Federal grant programs, to Pueto Rico. These provisions currently apply to the Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands, and the Northern Marianas. P.L. 95-134 allows Federal agencies to consolidate grants available to these insular areas in response to a single application. If Puerto Rico were brought under this legislation, it could receive consolidated grants from Federal agencies equal to the sum of grants to which it would otherwise be entitled for that agency. The consolidated grant would be for the programs and purposes authorized under any of the grants being consolidated, but the Commonwealth would determine how the funds should be allocated. Regulations would be published covering the application and reporting processes. Presumably, the administering authority would waive the requirements for matching funds. The Title XX program is not treated as an exception under the bill. Hence, Puerto Rico presumably could (but would not be required to) request that funds under this program be included in a consolidated grant from the Department of Health and Human Services. In this case, Puerto Rico would receive the same amount of funds it would otherwise be eligible to receive under Title XX, but could use these funds for other purposes. One possible incentive to consolidate the program with others would be the reduction in paperwork required in the application and reporting processes, although the paperwork burden of Title XX currently is minimal. It is uncertain how the additional funds that might be available for Title XX under the section 1108 cap would be affected by this option.

DEATH OF MICHAEL HARRINGTON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise with sadness to relay to my colleagues what many already know, which is that Michael Harrington, one of the world's leading socialists, theorists, an activists, died this week.

Michael Harrington was a friend for 40 years. I recall standing in line on the occasion of the signing of the Economic Opportunity Act in 1964 which established the Office of Economic Opportunity—the principal Federal agency in the war on poverty. I actually stood in line two times that day in order to receive two commemorative pens: one of which I delivered to him at the League for Industrial Democracy where he was serving as chairman.

Michael Harrington was a socialist of international stature and an organizer and worker of tireless energy. Illness did not thwart him. Only last month, he was named honorary president of Socialist International during the celebration of its centennial in Stockholm.

Michael Harrington stated that he desired to be "on the left wing of the possible." In an affectionate editorial, the New York Post writes: "The American left is poorer for his passing, as is American political life in general." agree.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial and an excellent obituary written by Herbert Mitgang of the New York Times be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Aug. 2, 1989]

MICHAEL HARRINGTON, SOCIALIST AND AUTHOR, IS DEAD

(By Herbert MItgang)

Michael Harrington, co-chairman of the Democratic Socialists of America and author of "The Other America," which helped to encourage the Federal Government's War on Poverty, died of cancer of the esophagus Monday at his home in Larchmont, N.Y. He was 61 years old.

Except for Norman Thomas, the Socialist Party's leader and longtime candidate for President, Mr. Harrington was probably the most visible spokesman for Socialist ideals in the United States. He often served as the American representative at international Democratic Socialist meetings.

As a political leader, lecturer and teacher and the author of 16 books, Mr. Harrington was active in organizational work most of his life. He was also a Distinguished Professor of Political Science at Queens College in Flushing.

Although surgery for cancer disfigured his face in recent years, Mr. Harrington continued to maintain a youthful attitude and the bonhomie of an inspiring political organizer. Illness did not stop him from writing and continuing his involvement in domestic politics and international socialism. Despite his poor health, he continued to work out of the offices of the Democratic Socialists in a former factory building in Lower Manhattan.

600 GATHER FOR TRIBUTE

Mr. Harrington succeeded in completing a seminal work, "Socialism: Past and Future," that was published last month by Arcade Publishers. In the book, he outlined a socialist future that could create a new, progressive society. He said that it must be international; that tax policies should redistribute wealth and increase growth without "takeover games"; that real control must come from below, and that "the inexorable socialization of the entire planet" can become "the tool, rather than the oppressor, of free women and men."

In June 1988, more than 600 friends and colleagues, including Senator Edward M. Kennedy, Democrat of Massachusetts, and Cesar Chavez, president of the United Farm Workers, held a celebration in the Roseland Ballroom in New York to honor Mr. Harrington.

Mr. Harrington, looking gaunt from the effects of chemotherapy, vowed to continue to campaign for his socialist beliefs as long as his health permitted. He described himself as "the long-distance runner," the title of one of his two autobiographical works, published in 1988.

"I see Michael Harrington as delivering the Sermon on the Mount to America." Mr. Kennedy said at that event. "Among veterans in the War on Poverty, no one has been a more loyal ally when the night was darkest."

The Democratic socialists of America, whose roots are in the Socialist Party, formed in 1983 in a merger of the Democratic Socialist Organizing Committee and the New American Movement. Unlike the Socialist Party, which runs its own candidates for public office, the Democratic Socialists group simply endorses candidates.

Asked in an interview how his brand of socialism differed from the system that had evolved in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, Mr. Harrington said:

"Put it this way. Marx was a democrat with a small d. The Democratic Socialists envision a humaine social order based on popular control of resources and production, economic planning, equitable distribution, feminism and racial equality. I share an immediate program with liberals in this country because the best liberalism leads toward socialism. I'm a radical, but as I tell my students at Queens, I try not to soapbox. I want to be on the left wing of the possible."

His political views earned him a place on President Nixon's "enemies' list." Asked if this troubled him, Mr. Harrington said, "I was in good company. It would have been terrible to be left off it."

Mr. Harrington's best-known work, "The Other America: Poverty in the United States," was published by Macmillan Publishing Inc. in 1962. In the book he argued that there was an underclass of the poor in America, which included tens of millions of Americans who, though employed, lived below the poverty line and were neglected by both the Government and the rest of society.

On the surface, he contended, some of these people seemed to be ignored by official measurements of poverty because they own items like an automobile or a television set, yet they could not enjoy the nation's resources and opportunities.

Mr. Harrington won the George Polk Award and the Sidney Hillman Award for "The Other America." Writing in The New York Times Book Review, A.H. Rasking, senior labor columnist of The Times, described the book as "a scream of rage and a call to conscience." While contending that Mr. Harrington had exaggerated both the size and intractability of the poverty problem, Mr. Raskin went on to say: "The chroniclers and celebrants of America's upward movement are plentiful. It is good to be reminded that we are still a long way from the stars."

In The New Yorker, Dwight Macdonald called the book "excellent and important" and said it analyzed the reasons for the persistence at vast poverty in the midst of general prosperity.

After seeing reviews of "The Other America," President Kennedy read the work himself, according to his aides. Kennedy subsequently supported Federal initiatives to help the poor. What later became known as the War on Poverty was largely carried out by President Johnson after Kennedy's death. It included the expansion of existing programs like Social Security, Aid to Families With Dependent Children and food stamps, as well as new programs for housing and medical care.

In addition to writing many newspaper and magazine articles about the philosophy of democratic socialism, Mr. Harrington was also the author of books on contemporary politics, including "The Next America," "The Next Left," "the Politics at God's Funeral," "Twilight of Capitalism," "Toward a Democratic Left" and "The Accidental Century." He was a member of the editorial board of Dissent.

In his autobiographical "Long-Distance Runner," Mr. Harrington wrote, "If the best values of humanity are to survive, then we will have to go down the road upon which I have been running.

"I am, in my own way, as militant as I was when I first became an active radical in 1951 and infinitely more radical than when I encountered a slum house in St. Louis in 1949. I have been enriched beyond belief in the struggle."

Mr. Harrington, who was born Feb. 24, 1928, in St. Louis, started out as a welfare worker, there after attending the College of the Holy Cross in Worcester, Mass., and the University of Chicago, where he earned a master's degree in 1949. He also attended Yale Law School for a year.

Afterward, he became associate editor of The Catholic Worker magazine, organization secretary of the Workers Defense League, a researcher, and later consultant for the Fund for the Republic and editor of New American magazine. In the Korean War, he declared that he was a conscientious objector.

In 1972, Mr. Harrington was appointed as a professor of political science at Queens College and was named a Distinguished Professor in 1988.

He served as chairman of the League for Industrial Democracy in 1964 and was a member of the national executive board of the Socialist Party from 1960 to 1968. He became chairman of the Democratic Socialists of America in 1982 and later was co-chairman of the party.

Mr. Harrington is survived by his wife, Stephanie, and two sons, Alexander Gervis, of Manhattan, and Edward Michael 3d, of Larchmont. Plans for a memorial service will be announced later.

MICHAEL HARRINGTON: 1928–1989

Michael Harrington, who died on Tuesday, was a leading exponent of a cause that has never gotten very far in the United States—democratic socialism.

He was a prolific writer, and—a powerful speaker and tireless organizer.

In "The Other America," the best known of his many books and essays, Harrington focused on the plight of all those who had failed to realize the American Dream. He wanted this country to remember those who hadn't made it—to be aware of their circumstances and to struggle to improve their lot.

Yet, unlike many on the American left, Harrington—for most of his career—was a staunch anti-communist with little tolerance for the anti-Americanism that long informed left-wing politics in the U.S.

He paid a price for his unwillingness to take part in ritualistic America-bashing, particularly during the 1960s: New Left admirers of Castro and Mao Tse-tung shunned him in those years, deeming his vision of socialism much too tame. And they were the dominant voices on the left for a very long time.

Actually, Michael Harrington was anything but tame. He was always a radical, and—as it happens—it was rare indeed that he took stances with which we would find ourselves in agreement.

But even his ideological adversaries could not fail to recognize his fundamental decency. This was an honorable man, someone with genuine character. The American left is poorer for his passing, as is American political life in general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the appropriation bill is before the Senate. I am wondering if we might get back on the matter at hand shortly.

I see the distinguished majority leader on the floor. If he wishes me to yield, I will be glad to and I will yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY].

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished majority leader without losing my rights to the floor, and when they conclude I may reclaim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The majority leader is recognized.

PRESIDENTIAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE AVIATION SECURITY AND THE BOMBING OF PAN AM FLIGHT 103

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, in recent days, discussions have occurred between myself and Senator DOLE and the White House, concerning the December 21, 1988, bombing of Pan American World Airways flight 103 and related issues of aviation security and terrorism.

The White House will today announce that the President soon intends to issue an Executive order to investigate issues arising out of the Pan Am tragedy.

Over 7 months have passed since the bombing of flight 103. In one tragic moment, 3 days before Christmas Eve, the aircraft fell upon the town of Lockerbie, Scotland, and 270 lives were lost.

Every American has grieved for the victims of flight 103, and shared the grief of their families.

Although the headlines of the tragedy have faded, questions still linger. They involve basic factual questions, such as what kind of warnings were received in advance; what actions were or were not taken in response to such warnings; and how security procedures that were in use might have failed.

The Pan Am flight 103 tragedy also involves broader policy questions: such as what kind of aviation security measures may be necessary under what conditions; what kind of warnings should be given to the traveling public; and where exactly responsibility should lie between airports, airlines, the Federal Government, and foreign governments, in seeking to protect the security of Americans traveling abroad.

These are important questions. They do not necessarily have simple answers. In a democracy, they deserve open public discussion—especially now, when the United States is threatened by acts of violence and terrorism which are abhorrent to our democratic values and institutions.

Various congressional committees already have held several hearings into events and issues surrounding the Pan Am 103 bombing. In the Senate, they included the Commerce Committee's Aviation Subcommittee; the Foreign Relations Committee's Subcommittee on Terrorism, Narcotics and International Operations; and the Appropriations Subcommittee on Transportation.

The results of these hearings have been inconclusive. They served primarily to demonstrate the need for additional detailed investigation. Hearing testimony failed to dispel doubts concerning aviation security, and in some instances raised only new questions.

The Department of Justice currently is conducting a criminal investigation into the bombing, and the Federal Aviation Administration is conducting its own internal investigation. However, the President has recognized that there are broad policy issues of immediate public concern which require independent, comprehensive investigation.

The creation of an independent Presidential Commission offers the most effective, appropriate means of addressing such issue.

The Commission's mandate shall be to review and evaluate policy options in connection with aviation security, with particular reference to the bombing of Pan Am flight 103.

The President intends to appoint a seven-person commission, including four Members of Congress: two appointed from the Senate and two from the House of Representatives, after consultation with congressional leaders. It is my understanding that the Executive order will be issued as soon as members have been selected.

The Commission also is not intended to duplicate, nor interfere with ongoing criminal or counterterrorism investigations into the Pan Am 103 bombing. The emphasis should be on prospectively addressing aviation security and related issues.

The Pan Am bombing serves as a focal point for such an inquiry. The Commission also may want to consider other cases or incidents with direct relevance to the issues with its mandate.

The Commission's report to the President will be made within 6 months of the date of the Executive order. To the extent that the report contains any classified information, a nonclassified version shall be prepared for public distribution.

It is possible that the Commission report and its recommendations may serve as the basis for additional congressional oversight hearings—or as a basis for consideration of legislation by the appropriate committees of jurisdiction.

The President's intended order directs the cooperation of all executive agencies in assisting the Commission's work. I also point out that congressional committees, to the extent that any future oversight of the Commission's work might be required, themselves wield subpoena powers.

My understanding of the President's intention is that a thorough investigation is desired and expected. It also is my understanding that any testimony and submissions made to the Commission, in the course of its investigation, if false or misleading, will be subject to criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. 1001.

I welcome the President's action. And I am pleased that issues arising out of the bombing will be addressed.

I commend Senator FORD, chairman of the Aviation Subcommittee and Senator LAUTENBERG, chairman of the Appropriations Transportation Subcommittee, who along with other Senators first brought this issue to my attention.

For their roles also in conferring with Senator DOLE and myself on the issue, I commend Mr. Bert Ammerman, of New Jersey, president of the Families of the Victims of Pan Am Flight 103; Mr. Paul Hudson, of New York, chairman of the group's Legislative Committee; and the other committee members; Mrs. Rosemary Wolfe, of Virginia; Mr. George Williams, of Maryland; and Mrs. Victoria Cummock, of Florida.

The efforts of all the families in support of a Commission has been an indication of their devotion to the memories of those whom they have lost—and their devotion as American citizens in asking for greater aviation security for us all. I hope the work of the Commission will help us reach that important goal.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may yield to the distinguished Republican leader under the same terms and restrictions as before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

COMMISSION ON PAN AM FLIGHT 103

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the distinguished majority leader to announce that President Bush has signed an Executive order to create a Commission to investigate the security failure which led to the bombing of Pan Am flight 103 on December 21, 1988, as well the safety from terrorism of commercial air travel.

The majority leader has outlined the makeup of the Commission, when that Commission would report, and what the duties of that Commission would be.

The Commission will be composed of seven members, with one Republican and one Democrat from both the Senate and the House, in addition to three other members appointed by the President.

It will, within 6 months, report to the President and to the American people on what happened to the flight of Pan Am 103, as well as review past and current security procedures and recommend additonal steps which might be taken to reduce the risk of a similar bombing from ever occurring again.

I commend President Bush for this initiative. The majority leader and I have been working with the administration and members of the families of the victims of flight 103 for several months to reach this point.

Mr. President, I want to make clear that we have no intention of jeopardizing the ongoing criminal investigation or to compromise any intelligence sources or methods. I can assure my colleagues, however, that the investigation is moving forward, and the administration does expect to find those responsible for this deplorable action.

The flying public should be assured of their safety from terrorism, and I believe this Commission will go a long way toward meeting that assurance.

It is important to note again that in addition to trying to determine what happened on Pan Am flight 103, in reviewing past and current security procedures, there will also be recommendations on additional steps which might be taken to reduce the risk of a similar bombing from ever occurring again. I commend President Bush for this initiative.

I know that some family members who suffered this tragic loss have been frustrated from time to time trying to determine which kind of a forum would be the best, the best to serve not only their interests but the interests of those who may travel by air in the future.

I believe this is a good resolution. I believe the Rogers Commission that was convened and did a splendid job in hearing the concerns and determining the facts in the Challenger disaster has set an example and I would hope that this Commission would pattern themselves after the Rogers Commission.

But in any event, this is a good initiative. The majority leader and I, as he has stated, have been working with members of the families of the victims of flight 103 for several months to reach this point.

Mr. President, I want to make it clear that we have no intention of jeopardizing the ongoing criminal investigation or to compromise any intelligence sources or methods. And that becomes a big, big concern of some in the administration and certainly a concern of family members and a concern of Members of the U.S. Senate and the House of Representatives.

I can assure my colleagues, however, that the investigation is moving forward and the administration does expect to find those responsible for this deplorable action. The flying public should be assured of their safety from terrorism, and I believe this Commission will go a long way toward meeting that assurance.

Mr. President, I will include in the RECORD a number of the steps taken by the administration since the bombing of Pan Am 103. It has instituted a number of new procedures, all of which, I believe, have contributed to air safety. In addition, it talks about the Department of State and the Department of Transportation.

I must say—and I think it has been agreed to by the present officials in the State Department—that much of the concern of family members was the way they were treated by the State Department following the crash. It seems to me, when you look back, that some things that happened should not have happened. How they were treated by the State Department officials certainly properly give rise to the frustration and anger that some of the members of the families of the victims felt.

In any event, the commission will be announced today by the President.

I want to thank the majority leader for his work. I also want to thank Al Lehn, on my staff, and Bob Carolla, on the majority leader's staff, who spent many, many weeks to put this together.

I ask unanimous consent that the list of initiatives be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AVIATION SECURITY MEASURES

Since the bombing of Pan Am 103, the administration has instituted the following aviation security measures:

I. THE DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION AND THE FEDERAL AVIATION ADMINISTRATION

1. On December 29, 1988 the FAA instituted heightened security requirements in Western Europe and the Middle East:

Airlines must complete a 100% x-ray or physical inspection of all checked baggage.

Passengers may not access the contents of their checked baggage following the security inspection.

Airlines must perform a positive match of passenger and baggage to ensure unaccompanied bags are not loaded onto the aircraft.

Airlines must take additional measures to preclude unauthorized access to baggage from check-in to loading on board the aircraft.

An increased number of passengers will be randomly selected for enhanced screening. Checked baggage of the persons identified for enhanced screening must be physically inspected.

Small packages and parcels that are shipped through passenger ticket counters must be x-rayed or physically examined prior to shipment.

2. On January 15, 1988 the FAA Administrator wired a request through the State Department to all major aviation partners urging them to raise security levels for all carriers.

3. On January 24, 1988 the U.S. and the United Kingdom called for a special session of the International Civil Aviation Organization (ICAO), the aviation arm of the United Nations, to address security measures. On February 15, as one of his first official acts, Secretary Skinner traveled to Montreal for the ICAO special session. He led the U.S. delegation and worked successfully for unanimous adoption of a resolution that should lead to strengthened security procedures throughout the world. ICAO currently is reviewing existing standards to determine what changes are needed, and is considering development of a set of extraordinary measures for use when increased threat levels exist. ICAO also agreed to expedite research and development on detecting explosives and to explore the possibility of establishing an international protocol for the marking of explosives.

Secretary Skinner recently wrote ICAO, emphasizing the importance of their mission and encouraging them to take swift action.

4. On March 16, 1989, the FAA issued a final regulation which requires foreign air carriers serving the United States to adopt and use security programs that are acceptable to the FAA.

5. On March 19, 1989, Secretary Skinner dispatched a team of personal representatives to Europe to review current security procedures and coordination with foreign governments in the wake of Pan Am 103. Upon their return, they provided their recommendations for further improving the system.

6. On April 3, 1989, as a first installment of the Administration's commitment to the families, Secretary Skinner announced a sweeping series of security initiatives. Among the proposed changes were the following:

The FAA will initiate a rulemaking to require airlines to install and utilize explosive detection systems, such as thermal neutron analysis (TNA) units, at the earliest feasible date. The Department of Transportation and the State Department currently are negotiating with airport authorities to permit installation of TNA units at the world's busiest airports.

Additional FAA security specialists will be deployed to selected locations. Further security specialists will be added and funded in the FY 1990 budget, bringing the FAA security force to approximately 700 personnel. Deployment of these personnel will provide continuing oversight of carrier compliance with FAA security requirements, and provide consistent FAA support for and contact with U.S. airlines and foreign government officials.

The security bulletin system has been improved to ensure that countermeasures to be taken by U.S. airlines in response to threats are clearly specified; that airlines acknowledge receipt of bulletins; and that airlines notify the FAA of responsive actions taken within a strictly limited time. Airline compliance with security bulletins will be mandatory. The Administration is also discussing with foreign governments new procedures for more effective coordination and dissemination of security information.

The FAA has proposed changes to airline security programs to (1) require the use of state-of-the-art x-ray and metal detection equipment, and (2) ensure that appropriate security threat information is distributed to pilots in command of airline flights.

A National Aviation Security Advisory Committee, chaired by the FAA's director of Civil Aviation Security, and composed of members of the aviation and intelligence community, is being formed to provide a forum for the exchange and coordination of security programs and research and development information.

7. The FAA is continuing an aggressive program of foreign airport assessments in accordance with the Internal Security and Development Cooperation Act. Since the inception of this program in 1986, it has conducted over 800 visits to over 200 foreign airports in 107 countries. This program has helped in improving safety at many foreign airports.

8. On April 21, 1989, Secretary Skinner traveled to Europe to discuss implementation of security initiatives abroad, to convey the strong wishes of the President that additional measures be implemented, and generally to ensure that the global threat of terrorism be seen as such and put to a halt by the world community.

9. Finally, the Administrator has established a task force of DOT and FAA policy and security experts to; follow up on the recommendations of Secretary Skinner's representatives, and to explore new and innovative security actions that can be taken over the long term.

II. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

1. The Consular Affairs Bureau of the Department and the Embassy in London have undertaken a serious review of procedures for managing disasters abroad, which encompasses the following issues:

The Department will take a leadership role in notifying next-of-kin. They have talked to Pan Am already and expect to talk to all other U.S. international carriers to define their role. Early release to the Department of their airlines passenger manifest list is a priority issue.

Complete recognition that providing timely and accurate information to the families of victims is critical. They are studying ways to better do this in the future both from Washington and at the scene of any disaster.

The Department will prepare condolence cables signed by an appropriate high-level official. These will supplement telephone contacts with the families.

The Department will set up a case worker system at an early stage.

The Department is looking carefully at new automated systems for more efficient response in a crisis. During this review they are studying the feasibility of an 800 telephone for next-of-kin to call in disaster situations.

The Department is consulting closely with its Medical Bureau about sensitivity techniques for dealing with bereaved people who lose loved ones in disasters.

The Department is looking at ways to do more training of consular personnel to be better prepared both in Washington and in the field.

The Department is considering establishing a pool of consular officers with crisis experience to staff the Department task forces and assist on site overseas.

The Department is looking at additional portable equipment that their consular officers can transport to the disaster site, i.e., lap top computers, tape recorder, etc. to help in the management of the crisis.

2. The State Department conducted a top-to-bottom review of its threat notification system and, with the unanimous agreement of the Department of Transportation and the intelligence community, enunciated the following clear U.S. policy:

If there is a specific and credible threat to civil aviation security which cannot be countered, the Department of Transportation will strongly recommend to the air carrier that it cancel the threatened flight. If it is a U.S. carrier, the FAA will order the flight to be cancelled if the airline will not.

If necessary, the Department of State will issue a public travel advisory to alert the American travelling public to this threat. This notice will be widely disseminated in cooperation with U.S. and foreign media, our Embassies abroad and the travel industry itself.

3. The State Department clarified to our Embassies and Consulates abroad that FAA Aviation Security Bulletins are not threat advisories to U.S. government personnel and that they are subject to a very limited distribution. Secretary Baker stated these procedures in the clearest possible language to ensure that all government personnel understand the purpose and limited dissemination of FAA Aviation Security Bulletins.

The State Department stated publicly and repeatedly that there is not, and cannot be, a double standard between the travel security information available to official personnel overseas and to the American public.

4. The State Department undertook diplomatic initiatives to prevent a repetition of Pan Am 103, including:

A special meeting of the Terrorism Experts Group of the Summit 7 was called on January 19-20 in response to the Pan Am 103 bombing, where our allies agreed to bring this issue to an international forum.

The State Department's initiative and participation during the Special Session of ICAO in Montreal were instrumental in reaching the unanimous resolution adopted by ICAO to combat terrorism.

To advance the exchange of information on "tagging" plastic explosives, the U.S. hosted in Washington on 2-3 March a meeting of explosives experts from a number of allied states. At the meeting a workplan was established for further research into the basic issues involved in detecting plastic explosives. The U.S. also participated in similar meetings held earlier this month under ICAO auspices in Montreal.

5. While not initiated in the immediate aftermath of Pan Am 103, the other noteworthy initiatives are:

The national, interagency counterterrorism R&D program, which is coordinated with twenty-five federal agencies and funded through the State Department, which funds research to develop less expensive and more widely applicable detectors to identify plastic explosives.

The Anti-Terrorism Assistance Program (ATA) which offers training to help ensure that participating foreign governments have an effective aviation security program, including well-trained staff, supplemented by a variety of technical aids.

III. NATIONAL SECURITY COUNCIL

Following the meeting of the families with the President, the President directed National Security Advisor Scowcroft to review the procedures with respect to terrorist threat notification for civil aviation. Secretary Skinner and General Scowcroft have met, and senior staff of the Department of Transportation, the National Security Council, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Defense Intelligence Agency, the Department of State, the Department of Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation have also been meeting.

Although it is not prudent to discuss the substance of communications with the intelligence community, the Administration is now confident that the already good coordination that existed with these groups has been significantly enhanced.

PAN AM 103 COMMISSION

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I join in commending the President for his decision to issue the Executive order creating a Commission to investigate the terrorist bombing of Pan Am flight 103 last December. I commend the majority leader and the minority leader as well for their skillful role in the negotiations that led to the President's order.

The appointment of the Commission also represents the successful culmination of a long and dedicated effort and a labor of love for the families of the victims of that tragedy. They deserve this measure of justice in the name of their loved ones who perished in the bombing.

I have met with many members of the families of the victims from Massachusetts, and I join them in hoping that this Commission will provide answers to the many questions that have been raised about that terrorist atrocity. I commend the families for refusing to take no for an answer, and for insisting that these difficult questions must be thoroughly investigated and answered to the best of our ability. The families of the victims deserve no less, and the American traveling public deserves no less.

PAN AM FLIGHT 103

Mr. MACK. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. President, I rise on behalf of my constituent Victoria Cummock and her three small children, and other victims who were murdered in the bombing of Pan Am flight 103.

I applaud the Senate leadership for the commitment to act and spearhead this badly needed investigation which inspired our President to make the announcement today about the formation of a Commission.

It was through the tenacious efforts of Senators LAUTENBERG, D'AMATO, METZENBAUM, Majority Leader MITCHELL, and Minority Leader DOLE that these issues will be properly addressed and, hopefully, that no longer will it be "easy to kill Americans" as stated by terrorist sponsors such as Iran's Rafsanjani.

A renewed commitment of safety to all Americans by tighter aviation security measures will ensure that the murders of the passengers on Pan Am 103 will not have been in vain.

I thank the Chair.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

INDEPENDENT COMMISSION ON AVIATION SECURITY AND TERRITORY

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I just want to make a statement to acknowledge the work that the majority leader did resulting in the announcement that was made just a short while ago about the Independent Commission on Aviation Security and Terrorism.

It is in great part due to his efforts over the last few weeks that this has finally come about.

I would also like to commend the distinguished Republican leader for his efforts.

I also would like to thank my colleagues, Senator FORD and Senator HOLLINGS, for their support of this Commission. I also want to thank and compliment President Bush and Secretary Skinner for joining together with us in the Congress on this important issue and with the families of those who lost their lives on Pan Am 103.

Mr. President, it has been 7½ long months since the bombing of Pan Am 103. Two hundred seventy-six innocent people lost their lives to cowardly terrorism.

In that time we have searched for the full truth about what happened then. Unfortunately, until now the answers have eluded us, but we must continue our search.

We owe it to the victims, to the families, to all Americans who travel and indeed, as I said, to the memory of those who died.

As we have seen in recent days brutal terrorism is not going away, and this Nation cannot be allowed to be brought to its knees by these madmen. We need to find out where our counterterrorism efforts are lacking and to correct those problems.

The Aviation Security Commission can help us move ahead in that effort. It will. As I understand, its mission addresses the nagging question surrounding the destruction of Pan Am 103, and it must address the major policy issues we face in these areas as to who was notified, when, and what information did we have available to us.

Mr. President, I sought to have an independent commission appointed back in March of this year. At that time I ran into opposition on the floor of the U.S. Senate. I am pleased to see, however, that perseverance pays off. The families have refused to take no as an answer. Today, they know that they will have a real chance of finding out what took place.

I thank the President pro tempore, and I yield the floor.

TREASURY, POST OFFICE, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, AND INDEPENDENT AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1990

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I understand that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts wishes me to yield to him briefly and I shall.

While the distinguished majority leader is on the floor, and the distinguished Republican leader, may I point out that the business before the Senate at this time is the Senate appropriations bill, a bill making appropriations for the Treasury and Postal Service and other agencies. There is a pending first- and second-degree amendment at this point, with the first-degree amendment of course being the stalking horse used as a vehicle for the second-degree amendment.

I had hoped that we might get the offerer of the second-degree amendment to withdraw the amendment because this appropriations bill is the fourth of 13 appropriations bills, 3 having already passed the Senate, with 9 more regular appropriations bills, after this appropriations bill is passed, if and when it is passed. That is to say nothing of any additional supplemental appropriations bill that might come along. I do not know of any such at the moment.

I have not talked to the distinguished Republican leader about this. I would like to express the hope that he would use his good offices—and I am not sure that he can do any more than I can do in this particular instance—that he would use his good offices in trying to persuade the offerer of the amendment in the second degree, who is the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, my friend, JESSE HELMS, to persuade him from pursuing this amendment on this bill.

Now, I personally have no compunctions about voting on the amendment. I am 100 percent against it. I am against a pension for Ollie North and I have no apologies to make in any quarter, any city, or any county in my State or anywhere else in the country for taking that position.

I am not in favor of a pension for someone who has obstructed the carrying out of justice in this country; someone who has violated the laws, knowingly and willfully; someone who has lied to the Congress. So I have no problem. He took the same oath under the Constitution that we took. The verbiage may have been a little different. But we all took an oath—he and I and every Member of this body, to uphold and support the Constitution and the laws. And the laws emanate from the organic power given to the legislative branch by that Constitution. So we all know what we are doing when we violate the laws.

So, I have no problem with voting against the amendment. I say that for the record. I am not looking for a rock to hide under or a bush to hide behind. That is where I stand.

I was not brought up to believe that one should knowingly violate the Constitution of the United States, violate the laws of the land, or that one should willfully avoid telling the truth to the Congress or committees thereof.

I appointed part of the so-called Iran-Contra Committee. Had I been chairman of that committee, I am sure there would have been more than one confrontation between Oliver North's "potted plant" lawyer and this Senator. But that was not the case.

I think it was with contempt toward Congress what happened. I am not hesitant at any point to cast my vote against Ollie North. He has had his due process, he has had his justice in court, and gotten off rather lightly, may I add.

So that is my position on the amendment. I am sorry to see the appropriations bills used as vehicles for very controversial amendments that constitute legislation on appropriations bills. Every appropriations bill that comes before the Senate probably has some legislation in it, often because the other body has already opened the door. That is usually the case.

So, the doors having been opened by the other body, the Senate has a right to offer its amendments. But in this case, this is a very controversial amendment. It has nothing to do with the appropriations process. There was an agreement reached, I believe just very recently, which provided that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate would have an opportunity to look at the Oliver North matter and report back to the Senate thereon. And the Senate could then take whatever actions it wished to take accordingly.

I just want to say to the distinguished Republican leader, I hope in the light of that kind of an understanding and agreement, we can persuade Members not to offer this amendment to this bill.

The Senator from North Carolina has a perfect right to offer it. My friend has a perfect right to offer his amendment. I do not question that right. But it is holding up the bill. The Appropriations Committee has worked hard. The subcommittee chairman and ranking member, members of both sides of the subcommittee and the full committee, have worked hard to bring this bill to the floor. It has to go to conference.

We are making right good progress on appropriation bills. Customarily the Senate has to await the action by the House.

The committees have worked hard and we are trying to beat the fiscal year deadline. I can see in this kind of amendment here, a serious obstacle, however.

FSX VETO

I beg the majority leader's pardon. I wanted to ask the minority leader a question while the majority leader is on the floor.

What is the likelihood of the FSX veto message being brought up today? On the floor? Could we get a time agreement on it?

I understand the majority leader has made efforts to get a time agreement on that veto message. I understood that my equally good friend, the Republican leader, has said that he would look into the matter. I am just wondering what the latest information is.

I yield for the answer.

Mr. DOLE. The latest is some of my Members are in flight, about three of them, whom I need very desperately to sustain the President's veto.

It may be that if we wait long enough, three might be in flight on your side so we could even that out.

I would say to the distinguished President pro tempore that we have been working on it throughout the day. In fact, I guess we were near agreement on a 2-hour time agreement. The question is whether we bring it up or not, when we bring it up. Obviously, as Republican leader, I want to cooperate with the majority, but we would also like to prevail.

The President has made a few phone calls during the day. He had some good response; some mixed; some unmixed.

But I would just say to the Senator from West Virginia, it is probably not going to be possible to get a time agreement. Because I think, as he understands, it is not an unwillingness on my part; it is just a fact of life that within the last hour and a half, three Members who would have voted to sustain the veto have now departed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Constitution does not require that all Members who have been elected and sworn vote on the veto measure. It requires it be overridden by two-thirds who are present and voting.

I would be very willing to take my chances. It was my amendment that the President vetoed, and I would like to see it voted.

I can understand and appreciate the President's desire to have a veto sustained. I can understand the Republican leader's desire to uphold the President's veto. But I think we ought to have a vote. Let the chips fall where they may. Let those three who are in the air land safely and maybe they can come back by midnight tonight or Monday, or we could move to table the veto message, or whatever. I do not see why we should hold up the business of the Senate when people's jobs, millions of jobs in this country, are affected by what may happen.

I realize what the stakes are, but I have to think of the stakes that mean something to our people in this country who have been losing their jobs. I have a desire to help the President in his efforts to reach the second memorandum of understanding with the Japanese. The amendment is crafted to that end, in support of everything that the administration wants. Forty percent of the production of spare parts, no transfer of engine technology, no transfer of the FSX, or any component thereof. It is everything the administration wants. I would like to help the President by overriding his veto so that we give the President and the administration additional leverage in dealing with the Japanese.

I think the administration needs some additional leverage. I think this amendment would give it to him.

Yes, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, if the Senator would yield just for a comment in response to his question, I have discussed the matter on several occasions with the distinguished Republican leader for the reasons stated. He is understandably unwilling to agree to a time agreement and, under the circumstances, of course, we understand that.

I have indicated to him that I have reserved the right to move to that, which is an alternative that remains in the event we are unable to reach an agreement. We have discussed that.

So I think the best thing we can do is to continue such discussions. I hope very much we are going to be able to act on the S&L legislation in the near future, in the immediate future. I am awaiting such legislation from the House, the papers. As soon as that does occur, why, then I suggest we continue these discussions that we have had over the past several days.

Mr. BYRD. Very well. I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Back on appropriations matters, Mr. President, I know that the President wants 13 appropriations bills on his desk before the fiscal calendar year deadline.

I am doing everything I can to help him get those 13 bills. I helped last year, and we were able to do it, and we will do it again. We will find it difficult to do if Members seek to use appropriations bills as vehicles for the kinds of very, very controversial amendments as the one that has now been offered in the second degree. I hope that reason will prevail and that my good friend from North Carolina would discuss this matter and would withdraw the amendment. Otherwise, I guess we will just have to carry the bill over until after the recess.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I want to express my affection and respect for the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate. He is saying that the Senate ought to vote on the FSX, and I am with him on that. But I have been sitting here 2½ hours now with the yeas and nays on my amendment. Why do we not let the Senate work its will on that?

Mr. BYRD. Under the Constitution, the President certainly has his right to exercise a veto. He, under the Constitution, is to return that veto message to the House in which the legislation originated. In this case, that is the Senate. It came back to the Senate and, under the Constitution, the Senate should vote on it.

That is the difference; that is the distinction. We are talking about a veto message here and the Senate's obligation under the Constitution to vote one way or the other at some point. I confess that there have been veto messages that never were voted on again by the body in which they originated, but that is the distinction.

As to the amendment the distinguished Senator offered, the Senate is under no obligation to vote on it now or ever. I already said what I said insofar as the amendment. That answers, I hope, the Senator's question. Does he have another?

Mr. HELMS. In the first place, and I say this most respectfully, sir, it does not answer my question. I am simply saying we have wasted 2½ hours while means are being devised to try to avoid a vote on my amendment. If it is a bad amendment, let the Senate pass judgment on it. The Senator has one view on it, and I have another.

Mr. BYRD. I think I have already answered that question. Earlier I spoke about the agreement, I believe it was on the Defense authorization bill. The Senator offered the same amendment. The Judiciary Committee is to take a look at that proposition and at the appropriate time will report back to the Senate.

So that step having been taken, the Senator from North Carolina having been assured that the Judiciary Committee will be examining this proposition in due time, and there is going to be many other opportunities for the Senator and other Senators to offer this amendment, I would certainly hope that he would wait until the Judiciary Committee had time to carry out its commitment with the Senate to respond. That would seem to be reasonable to me. That is why I do not think we need to vote on this today.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. HELMS. If at any point, I say to my colleague, I begin to offend him, I am going to sit down because he is my friend and I want to continue that friendship. But the Senator knows, I think he knows, that the reason Senator MITCHELL, the distinguished majority leader, was able to concoct this drawn-out thing, which delays it until October 1, is because of priority recognition, which I agree with. But that was a circumvention of a vote on my amendment. And here we go again. With that, I am going to sit down with great respect for the Senator.

I am just handed a little momorandum about the fact that the trade bill was held up many months until the election of 1988. I do not know if it is relevant. I thank the Senator. I understand his position, and I hope he understands mine.

Mr. BYRD. I do understand the Senator, and I thank him. Let me say again we are talking about the appropriations bill. These are the bills that the Congress has to pass. Congress always has to pass appropriations bills before they can go home sine die if we are going to continue to run the Government. It is an absolute must bill, appropriations. That is why I am saying to my good friend from North Carolina, let our people go on these appropriations bills. Let our people go. Let our people go on the appropriations bills.

Mr. HELMS. If the Senator will yield, let the Senators vote on the amendment, that is all I am saying. This could have been ended 2½ hours ago.

Mr. BYRD. Yes; I heard the Senator say that, and I responded to it. With all due respect to my friend, the senior Senator in the State in which I was born, I have answered that question and he has answered mine, so I suppose we ought to sit down.

Mr. President, we may sooner or later have to vote on this question. I certainly am not going to be very accommodating with respect to efforts to derail or hold up these appropriations bills. When we get back, the fiscal year deadline will be rushing upon us. I would not at this point go any further than the conference in any event. So its purpose here I suppose is to get a vote. It is not going to become law if it goes by passage here. It will not become law here. It goes to conference.

Mr. DOLE. Will the majority leader yield for a question and a comment?

Mr. BYRD. Yes; I yield to the distinguished Republican leader, and I ask unanimous consent that I may retain my rights to the floor.

Mr. DOLE. I will be very brief. I know the Senator from Massachusetts has been waiting. I just wanted to indicate on the FSX, I think the majority leader understands, not that we do not want to vote. The administration announced the terms of this agreement on April 28, 1989, and on May 1, 1989, the President sent both Houses of Congress a message. The Senate voted on May 16, 1989, and the House voted on June 7, 1989, and June 7, 1989, it was cleared to be delivered, in other words, should have gone to the White House on June 7, but was held by someone until July 19 before it went to the White House. It was held for over 5 weeks in the Congress. The President received it on July 19, and July 31, just 4 days ago, the veto message was received in the Senate.

I wanted the record to reflect, I know we are going into recess, but as far as legislative days, we only had it about 4 legislative days. I want the majority to understand we are not dragging our feet. I know it is a privileged matter and can be called up at any time. The record should reflect that had there been speedier action by the Congress, we would have had this disposed of probably during the month of June. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Republican leader.

Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY] with the understanding I do not lose my right to the floor, and I do not intend to keep the floor all afternoon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BYRD. Let me, before I yield, say that I am going to offer a cloture petition. I will not offer it right now because I do not have the 16 signatures yet, but any Senators who wish to rush to my desk and sign this cloture motion may do so. I will offer it and at least will hopefully vote when we get back from the recess on the motion to invoke cloture on the Treasury, Postal Service appropriations bill.

I hope it will not have to reach a point where we have to offer a cloture motion on every appropriations bill when it is first called up in order to keep certain amendments, controversial amendments off the bill to speed up the process hopefully. I do not want to have to do that, but in this instance, I am going to offer a cloture motion shortly. It does not make any difference who has the floor. We will vote on that when we get back if we cannot vote on it before we go out for the recess. That is about the only thing I know to do under the situation that confronts the Senate at the moment.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished President pro tempore. I know the majority leader had some business that I think he wanted the President pro tempore to try to process while the minority leader is here. I see the minority leader has departed from the floor. I am certainly willing to yield back in order to permit that to happen if the leader would then yield to me.

Mr. BYRD. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, it was my understanding from the majority leader that he had a number of bills that had been cleared on both sides that he wished the distinguished President pro tempore to move adoption of. I am willing to let that happen to speed up the process.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is correct and, if it is convenient for the President pro tempore, I am happy to represent the Republican leadership.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. WARNER] and I thank the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. KERRY].

CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES ACT

Mr. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of S. 976, a bill to postpone the effective date of section 511(e)(3)(B) of the Controlled Substances Act relating to the disposition of forfeited property in State law and the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 976) to postpone the effective date of section 511(e)(3)(B) of the Controlled Substances Act relating to disposition of forfeited property and State law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, my amendment deals with a provision in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 (Public Law 110-690) that is of great concern to the Commonwealth of Virginia.

Section 6077 of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 amended section 511(e) of the Controlled Substances Act (21 U.S.C. 881(e)) to restore equitable sharing principles to the transfer of forfeited assets from Federal to State and local agencies under the Controlled Substances Act. This provision restored language that was inadvertently deleted by the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1986.

I am concerned, however, with (a)(3)(B) which added new language to prohibit any transfer "to circumvent any requirement of State law that prohibits forfeiture or limits use or disposition of property forfeited to State or local agencies." This language was not in the Senate version of the legislation, but was added in conference.

In the past, asset sharing from Federal law prosecutions directly benefited the Virginia local and State law enforcement agencies participating in the seizure. Article VII, section 8 of the constitution of Virginia, however, requires all fines and forfeitures to go to the State literary fund. Therefore, subsection (a)(3)(B) forecloses Federal sharing of forfeited assets with Virginia local law enforcement agencies.

I am in no way advocating that Virginia's or any other State's laws be circumvented by the forfeited asset sharing provisions of Federal law. I am concerned, however, that (a)(3)(B) will prevent local and State law enforcement agencies from sharing in forfeiture assets during the time necessary to amend Virginia's constitution.

I have been advised that the last session of the Virginia General Assembly passed legislation to amend the constitution to allow State and local law enforcement officials to share in forfeited assets. However, to amend the constitution in Virginia, a proposed amendment must be passed twice by the general assembly with an intervening election and the amendment must then be ratified by the voters. Therefore, the Virginia constitutional amendment process allows ratification of this recently passed measure in November 1990 at the very earliest.

Virginia stands ready with trained and experienced law enforcement officials and institutions to help in the war against drugs. But these agencies need additional funds to obtain necessary information about the drug world. Sharing of forfeited assets provides local and State law enforcement officials with these additional resources and encourages cooperation in Federal and State law enforcement efforts.

While the process is already underway, Virginia needs additional time to amend its constitution to comply with the change in the law made last Congress. This legislation addresses this problem. I wish to work with my colleagues here and in the House to craft a solution which addresses the purpose of language in the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 while allowing States like Virginia adequate time to address the change in the law.

I urge my colleagues to join me in providing an extension of the effective date of section 511(e)(3)(B) for a period of time sufficient for Virginia to amend its constitution and any other States in a similar situation to revise their laws.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill (S. 976) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 976

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 6077(c) of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 is amended by striking "September 30, 1989" and inserting "September 30, 1991".

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed be laid upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

DISASTER ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1989

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 2467.

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2467) entitled "An Act entitled the '1988 Disaster Assistance Extension Act' ", with the following amendments:

SEC. 101. PAYMENTS TO PROGRAM PARTICIPANTS FOR TARGET PRICE COMMODITIES.

(a) DISASTER PAYMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Effective only for producers on a farm who elected to participate in the production adjustment program established under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.) for the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, extra long staple cotton, or rice, except as otherwise provided in this subsection, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that, because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, the total quantity of the 1989 crop of the commodity that such producers are able to harvest on the farm is less than the result of multiplying 60 percent (or, in the case of producers who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.), 65 percent) of the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the sum of the acreage planted for harvest and the acreage prevented from being planted (because of a natural disaster, as determined by the Secretary) for such crop, the Secretary shall make a disaster payment available to such producers at a rate equal to 65 percent of the established price for the crop for any deficiency in production greater than 40 percent (or, in the case of producers who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act, 35 percent) for the crop.

(2) LIMITATIONS.—

(A) ACREAGE IN EXCESS OF PERMITTED ACREAGE.—Payments provided under paragraph (1) for a crop of a commodity may not be made available to producers on a farm with respect to any acreage in excess of the permitted acreage for the farm for the commodity.

(B) CROP INSURANCE.—Payments provided under paragraph (1) for a crop of a commodity may not be made available to producers on a farm unless such producers enter into an agreement to obtain multiperil crop insurance, to the extent required under section 107.

(3) REDUCTION IN DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS.—The total quantity of a crop of a commodity on which deficiency payments otherwise would be payable to producers on a farm under the Agricultural Act of 1949 shall be reduced by the quantity on which a payment is made to the producers for the crop under paragraph (1).

(4) ELECTION OF PAYMENTS.—

(A) APPLICATION OF PARAGRAPH.—This paragraph shall apply, effective only for the 1989 crops of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice, to producers on a farm who—

(i)(I) had failed wheat, feed grain, upland cotton, or rice acreage; or

(II) were prevented from planting acreage to such commodity because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989; and

(ii) elected to devote all or a portion of such acreage to conservation or other uses in accordance with section 107D(c)(1)(C), 105C(c)(1)(B), 103A(c)(1)(B), or 101A(c)(1)(B) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1445b-3(c)(1)(C), 1444e(c)(1)(B), 1444-1(c)(1)(B), or 1441-1(c)(1)(B)).

(B) ELECTION.—The Secretary shall (within 30 days after the date of enactment of this Act) permit producers referred to in subparagraph (A) to elect whether to receive disaster payments in accordance with this section in lieu of payments under the sections referred to in subparagraph (A)(ii).

(b) ADVANCE DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS.—

(1) APPLICATION OF SUBSECTION.—This subsection shall apply only to producers on a farm who elected to participate in the production adjustment program established under the Agricultural Act of 1949 for the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, or rice.

(2) FORGIVENESS OF REFUND REQUIREMENT.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraph (B), if because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989 the total quantity of the 1989 crop of the commodity that the producers are able to harvest on the farm is less than the result of multiplying the farm program payment yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the sum of the acreage planted for harvest and the acreage prevented from being planted (because of a natural disaster, as determined by the Secretary) for such crop (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "qualifying amount"), the producers shall not be required to refund any advance deficiency payment made to the producers for such crop under section 107C of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1445b-2) with respect to that portion of the deficiency in production that does not exceed—

(i) in the case of producers who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act, 35 percent of the qualifying amount; and

(ii) in the case of other producers, 40 percent of the qualifying amount.

(B) CROP INSURANCE.—Producers on a farm shall not be eligible for the forgiveness provided for under subparagraph (A), unless such producers enter into an agreement to obtain multiperil crop insurance, to the extent required under section 107.9.

(3) ELECTION FOR NONRECIPIENTS.—The Secretary shall allow producers on a farm who elected, prior to the date of enactment of this Act, not to receive advance deficiency payments made available for the 1989 crop under section 107C of the Agricultural Act of 1949, to elect (within 30 days after the date of the enactment of this Act) whether to receive such advance deficiency payments.

(4) DATE OF REFUND FOR PAYMENTS.—Effective only for the 1989 crops of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, and rice, if the Secretary determines that any portion of the advance deficiency payment made to producers for the crop under section 107C of the Agricultural Act of 1949 must be refunded, such refund shall not be required prior to July 31, 1990, for that portion of the crop for which a disaster payment is made under subsection (a).

SEC. 102. PAYMENTS TO PROGRAM NONPARTICIPANTS FOR TARGET PRICE COMMODITIES.

(a) DISASTER PAYMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Effective only for producers on a farm who elected not to participate in the production adjustment program established under the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1421 et seq.) for the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, extra long staple cotton, or rice, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, the total quantity of the 1989 crop of the commodity that such producers are able to harvest on the farm is less than the result of multiplying 50 percent of the county average yield established by the Secretary for such crop by the sum of acreage planted for harvest and the acreage for which prevented planted credit is approved by the Secretary for such crop under subsection (b), the Secretary shall make a disaster payment available to such producers.

(2) PAYMENT RATE.—The payment shall be made to the producers at a rate equal to 65 percent of the basic county loan rate (or a comparable price if there is no current basic county loan rate) for the crop, as determined by the Secretary, for any deficiency in production greater than 50 percent for the crop.

(b) PREVENTED PLANTING CREDIT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall provide prevented planting credit under subsection (a) with respect to acreage that producers on a farm were prevented from planting to the 1989 crop of the commodity for harvest because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, as determined by the Secretary.

(2) MAXIMUM ACREAGE.—Such acreage may not exceed the greater of—

(A) a quantity equal to the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1988

minus acreage actually planted to the commodity for harvest in 1989; or

(B) a quantity equal to the average of the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1986, 1987, and 1988 minus acreage actually planted to the commodity for harvest in 1989.

(3) ADJUSTMENTS.—The Secretary shall make appropriate adjustments in applying the limitations contained in paragraph (2) to take into account crop rotation practices of the producers.

(c) LIMITATIONS.—

(1) ACREAGE LIMITATION PROGRAM.—The amount of payments made available to producers on a farm for a crop of a commodity under subsection (a) shall be reduced by a factor equivalent to the acreage limitation program percentage established for such crop under the Agricultural Act of 1949.

(2) CROP INSURANCE.—Payments provided under subsection (a) for a crop of a commodity may not be made available to the producers on a farm unless such producers enter into an agreement to obtain multiperil crop insurance, to the extent required under section 107.

SEC. 103. PEANUTS, SUGAR, AND TOBACCO.

(a) DISASTER PAYMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Effective only for the 1989 crops of peanuts, sugar beets, sugarcane, and tobacco, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that, because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, the total quantity of the 1989 crop of the commodity that the producers on a farm are able to harvest is less than the result of multiplying 60 percent (or, in the case of producers who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.), 65 percent) of the county average yield (or program yield, in the case of peanuts) established by the Secretary for such crop by the sum of the acreage planted for harvest and the acreage for which prevented planted credit is approved by the Secretary for such crop under subsection (b), the Secretary shall make a disaster payment available to such producers.

(2) PAYMENT RATE.—The payment shall be made to the producers at a rate equal to 65 percent of the applicable payment level under paragraph (3), as determined by the Secretary, for any deficiency in production greater than—

(A) in the case of producers who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act—

(i) 35 percent for the crop; or

(ii) with respect to a crop of burley tobacco or flue-cured tobacco, 35 percent of the farm's effective marketing quota for 1989; and

(B) in the case of producers who did not obtain crop insurance for the 1989 crop of the commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act—

(i) 40 percent for the crop; or

(ii) with respect to a crop of burley tobacco or flue-cured tobacco, 40 percent of the farm's effective marketing quota for 1989.

(3) PAYMENT LEVEL.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the payment level for a commodity shall be equal to—

(A) for peanuts, the price support level for quota peanuts or the price support level for additional peanuts, as applicable;

(B) for tobacco, the national average loan rate for the type of tobacco involved, or (if there is none) the market price, as determined under section 104(a)(2); and

(C) for sugar beets and sugarcane, a level determined by the Secretary to be fair and reasonable in relation to the level of price support established for the 1989 crops of sugar beets and sugarcane, and that, insofar as is practicable, shall reflect no less return to the producer than under the 1989 price support levels.

(b) PREVENTED PLANTING CREDIT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall provide prevented planting credit under subsection (a) with respect to acreage that producers on a farm were prevented from planting to the 1989 crop of the commodity for harvest because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, as determined by the Secretary.

(2) MAXIMUM ACREAGE.—Such acreage may not exceed the greater of—

(A) a quantity equal to the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1988 minus acreage actually planted to harvest in 1989; or

(B) a quantity equal to the average of the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1986, 1987, and 1988 minus acreage actually planted to the commodity for harvest in 1989.

(3) ADJUSTMENTS.—The Secretary shall make appropriate adjustments in applying the limitations contained in paragraph (2) to take into account crop rotation practices of the producers and any change in quotas for the 1989 crops of tobacco.

(c) LIMITATION.—Payments provided under subsection (a) for a crop of a commodity may not be made available to the producers on a farm unless such producers enter into an agreement to obtain multiperil crop insurance, to the extent required under section 107.

(d) SPECIAL RULES FOR PEANUTS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

(1) a deficiency in production of quota peanuts from a farm, as otherwise determined under this section, shall be reduced by the quantity of peanut poundage quota that was the basis of such anticipated production that has been transferred from the farm;

(2) payments made under this section shall be made taking into account whether the deficiency for which the deficiency in production is claimed was a deficiency in production of quota or additional peanuts and the payment rate shall be established accordingly; and

(3) the quantity of undermarketings of quota peanuts from a farm for the 1989 crop that may otherwise be claimed under section 358 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1358) for purposes of future quota increases shall be reduced by the quantity of the deficiency of production of such peanuts for which payment has been received under this section.

(e) SPECIAL RULES FOR TOBACCO.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law—

(1) the quantity of undermarketings of quota tobacco from a farm for the 1989 crop that may otherwise be claimed under section 317 or 319 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (7 U.S.C. 1314c or 1314e) for purposes of future quota increases shall be reduced by the quantity of the deficiency of production of such tobacco for which payment has been received under this section; and

(2) disaster payments made to producers under this section may not be considered by the Secretary in determining the net losses of the Commodity Credit Corporation under section 106A(d) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1445-1(d)).

SEC. 104. SOYBEANS AND NONPROGRAM CROPS.

(a) DISASTER PAYMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—

(A) ELIGIBILITY.—Effective only for the 1989 crops of soybeans and nonprogram crops, if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that, because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, the total quantity of the 1989 crop of the commodity that the producers on a farm are able to harvest is less than—

(i) with respect to soybeans and sunflowers, the result of multiplying 55 percent of the State, area, or county yield, adjusted for adverse weather conditions during the 1986, 1987, and 1988 crop years, as determined by the Secretary, for such crop by the sum of the acreage planted for harvest and the acreage for which prevented planting credit is approved by the Secretary for such crop under subsection (b);

(ii) with respect to nonprogram crops (other than as provided in clauses (i) and (iii)), the result of multiplying 50 percent of the yield established by the Commodity Credit Corporation under subsection (d)(2) for such crop by the sum of the acreage planted for harvest and the acreage for which prevented planting credit is approved by the Secretary for such crop under subsection (b); and the Secretary shall make a disaster payment available to such producers.

(iii) with respect to crops covered in section 201(b) of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1446(b)), 50 percent of the historical annual yield of the producers for such crops, as determined by the Secretary,

(B) PAYMENT RATE.—The payment shall be made to such producers at a rate equal to 65 percent of the applicable payment level under paragraph (2), as determined by the Secretary, for any deficiency in production greater than 45 percent for soybeans and sunflowers (50 percent for other nonprogram crops) for the crop.

(2) PAYMENT LEVEL.—For purposes of paragraph (1), the payment level for a commodity shall equal the simple average price received by producers of the commodity, as determined by the Secretary subject to paragraph (3), during the marketing years for the immediately preceding 5 crops of the commodity, excluding the year in which the average price was the highest and the year in which the average price was the lowest in such period.

(3) CALCULATION OF PAYMENTS FOR DIFFERENT VARIETIES.—

(A) CROP-BY-CROP BASIS.—The Secretary shall make disaster payments under this subsection on a crop-by-crop basis, with consideration given to markets and uses of the crops, under regulations issued by the Secretary.

(B) DIFFERENT VARIETIES.—For purposes of determining the payment levels on a crop by crop basis, the Secretary shall consider as separate crops, and develop separate payment levels insofar as is practicable for, different varieties of the same commodity, and commodities for which there is a significant difference in the economic value in the market.

(4) EXCLUSIONS FROM HARVESTED QUANTITIES.—For purposes of determining the total quantity of the 1989 nonprogram crop of the commodity that the producers on a farm are able to harvest under paragraph (1), the Secretary shall exclude at least 70 percent of—

(A) commodities that cannot be sold in normal commercial channels of trade; and

(B) dockage, including husks and shells, if such dockage is excluded in determining yields under subsection (d)(2).

(b) PREVENTED PLANTING CREDIT.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—The Secretary shall provide prevented planting credit under subsection (a) with respect to acreage that producers on a farm were prevented from planting to the 1989 crop of the commodity for harvest because of damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, as determined by the Secretary.

(2) MAXIMUM ACREAGE.—Such acreage may not exceed the greater of—

(A) a quantity equal to the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1988 minus acreage actually planted for harvest in 1989; or

(B) a quantity equal to the average of the acreage on the farm planted (or prevented from being planted due to a natural disaster or other condition beyond the control of the producers) to the commodity for harvest in 1986, 1987, and 1988 minus acreage actually planted to the commodity for harvest in 1989.

(3) ADJUSTMENTS.—The Secretary shall make appropriate adjustments in applying the limitations contained in paragraph (2) to take into account crop rotation practices of the producers.

(c) LIMITATION.—Payments provided under subsection (a) for a crop of a commodity may not be made available to the producers on a farm unless such producers enter into an agreement to obtain multiperil crop insurance, to the extent required under section 107.

(d) SPECIAL RULES FOR NONPROGRAM CROPS.—

(1) DEFINITION OF NONPROGRAM CROP.—As used in this section, the term "nonprogram crop" means all crops for which crop insurance through the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation was available for crop year 1989, and other commercial crops (including sweet potatoes) for which such insurance was not available for crop year 1989, except that such term shall not include a crop covered under section 101, 102, or 103, soybeans, or sunflowers.

(2) FARM YIELDS.—

(A) ESTABLISHMENT.—The Commodity Credit Corporation shall establish disaster program farm yields for nonprogram crops to carry out this section.

(B) PROVEN YIELDS AVAILABLE.—If the producers on a farm can provide satisfactory evidence to the Commodity Credit Corporation of actual crop yields on the farm for at least 1 of the immediately preceding 3 crop years, the yield for the farm shall be based on such proven yields.

(C) PROVEN YIELDS NOT AVAILABLE.—If such data do not exist for any of the 3 preceding crop years, the Commodity Credit Corporation shall establish a yield for the farm by using a county average yield for the commodity, or by using other data available to it.

(D) COUNTY AVERAGE YIELDS.—In establishing county average yields for nonprogram crops, the Commodity Credit Corporation shall use the best available information concerning yields. Such information may include extension service records, credible nongovernmental studies, and yields in similar counties.

(3) RESPONSIBILITY OF PRODUCERS.—It shall be the responsibility of the producers of nonprogram crops to provide satisfactory evidence of 1989 crop losses resulting from damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989 in order for such producers to obtain disaster payments under this section.

SEC. 105. CROP QUALITY REDUCTION DISASTER PAYMENTS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—To ensure that all producers of 1989 crops covered under sections 101 through 104 are treated equitably, the Secretary of Agriculture may make additional disaster payments to producers of such crops who suffer losses resulting from the reduced quality of such crops caused by damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, as determined by the Secretary.

(b) ELIGIBLE PRODUCERS.—If the Secretary determines to make crop quality disaster payments available to producers under subsection (a), producers on a farm of a crop described in subsection (a) shall be eligible to receive reduced quality disaster payments only if such producers incur a deficiency in production of not less than 45 percent and not more than 75 percent for such crop (as determined under section 101, 102, 103, or 104, as appropriate).

(c) MAXIMUM PAYMENT RATE.—The Secretary shall establish the reduced quality disaster payment rate, except that such rate shall not exceed 10 percent, as determined by the Secretary, of—

(1) the established price for the crop, for commodities covered under section 101;

(2) the basic county loan rate for the crop (or a comparable price if there is no current basic county loan rate), for commodities covered under section 102;

(3) the payment level under section 103(a)(3), for commodities covered by section 103; and

(4) the payment level under section 104(a)(2), for commodities covered under section 104.

(d) DETERMINATION OF PAYMENT.—The amount of payment to a producer under this section shall be determined by multiplying the payment rate established under subsection (c) by the portion of the actual harvested crop on the producer's farm that is reduced in quality by such natural disaster in 1988 or 1989, as determined by the Secretary.

SEC. 106. EFFECT OF FEDERAL CROP INSURANCE PAYMENTS.

In the case of producers on a farm who obtained crop insurance for the 1989 crop of a commodity under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.), the Secretary of Agriculture shall reduce the amount of payments made available under this subtitle for such crop to the extent that the amount determined by adding the net amount of crop insurance indemnity payment (gross indemnity less premium paid) received by such producers for the deficiency in the production of the crop and the disaster payment determined in accordance with this subtitle for such crop exceeds the amount determined by multiplying—

(1) 100 percent of the yield used for the calculation of disaster payments made under this subtitle for such crop; by

(2) the sum of the acreage of such crop planted to harvest and the acreage for which prevented planting credit is approved by the Secretary (or, in the case of disaster payments under section 101, the eligible acreage established under sections 101(a)(1) and 101(a)(2)(A)); by

(3)(A) in the case of producers who participated in a production adjustment program for the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, extra long staple cotton, or rice, the established price for the 1989 crop of the commodity;

(B) in the case of producers who did not participate in a production adjustment program for the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, extra long staple cotton, or rice, the basic county loan rate (or a comparable price, as determined by the Secretary, if there is no current basic county loan rate) for the 1989 crop of the commodity;

(C) in the case of producers of sugar beets, sugarcane, peanuts, or tobacco, the payment level for the commodity established under section 103(a)(3); and

(D) in the case of producers of soybeans or a nonprogram crop (as defined in section 104(d)(1)), the simple average price received by producers of the commodity, as determined by the Secretary, during the marketing years for the immediately preceding 5 crops of the commodity, excluding the year in which the average price was the highest and the year in which the average price was the lowest in such period.

SEC. 107. CROP INSURANCE COVERAGE FOR THE 1990 CROPS.

(a) REQUIREMENT.—Subject to the limitations under subsection (b), producers on a farm, to be eligible to receive a disaster payment under this subtitle, an emergency loan under subtitle C of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (7 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.) for crop losses due to damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989, or forgiveness of the repayment of advance deficiency payments under section 101(b), must agree to obtain multiperil crop insurance under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.) for the 1990 crop of the commodity for which such payments, loans, or forgiveness are sought.

(b) LIMITATIONS.—Producers on a farm shall not be required to agree to obtain crop insurance under subsection (a) for a commodity—

(1) unless such producers' deficiency in production, with respect to the crop for which a disaster payment under this subtitle otherwise may be made, exceeds 65 percent;

(2) where, or if, crop insurance coverage is not available to the producers for the commodity for which the payment, loan, or forgiveness is sought;

(3) if the producers' annual premium rate for such crop insurance is an amount greater than 125 percent of the average premium rate for insurance on that commodity for the 1989 crop in the county in which the producers are located;

(4) in any case in which the producers' annual premium for such crop insurance is an amount greater than 25 percent of the amount of the payment, loan, or forgiveness sought; or

(5) if the producers can establish by appeal to the county committee established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act (16 U.S.C. 590(b)), or to the county committee established under section 332 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act (17 U.S.C. 1982), as appropriate, that the purchase of crop insurance would impose an undue financial hardship on such producers and that a waiver of the requirement to obtain crop insurance should, in the discretion of the county committee, be granted.

(c) IMPLEMENTATION.—

(1) COUNTY COMMITTEES.—The Secretary of Agriculture shall ensure (acting through the county committees established under section 8(b) of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act and located in the counties in which the assistance programs provided for under sections 101 through 105 are implemented and through the county committees established under section 332 of the Consolidated Farm and Rural Development Act in counties in which emergency loans, as described in subsection (a), are made available) that producers who apply for assistance, as described in subsection (a), obtain multiperil crop insurance as required under this section.

(2) OTHER SOURCES.—Each producer who is subject to the requirements of this section may comply with such requirements by providing evidence of multiperil crop insurance coverage from sources other than through the county committee office, as approved by the Secretary.

(3) COMMISSIONS.—The Secretary shall provide by regulation for a reduction in the commissions paid to private insurance agents, brokers, or companies on crop insurance contracts entered into under this section sufficient to reflect that such insurance contracts principally involve only a servicing function to be performed by the agent, broker, or company.

(d) REPAYMENT OF BENEFITS.—Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if (prior to the end of the 1990 crop year for the commodity involved) the crop insurance coverage required of the producer under this section is canceled by the producer, the producer—

(1) shall make immediate repayment to the Secretary of any disaster payment or forgiven advance deficiency payment that the producer otherwise is required to repay; and

(2) shall become immediately liable for full repayment of all principal and interest outstanding on any emergency loan described in subsection (a) made subject to this section.

SEC. 108. CROPS HARVESTED FOR FORAGE USES.

(b) NO DOUBLE BENEFITS.—No person may receive disaster payments under this subtitle to the extent that such person receives a livestock emergency benefit for lost feed production in 1989 under section 606 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1471d).

(c) COMBINED LIMITATION.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—No person may receive any payment under this subtitle or benefit under title VI of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1471 et seq.) for livestock emergency losses suffered in 1989 if such payment or benefit will cause the combined total amount of such payments and benefits received by such person to exceed $100,000.

(2) ELECTION.—If a producer is subject to paragraph (1), the person may elect (subject to the benefits limitations under section 609 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1471g)) whether to receive the $100,000 in such payments, or such livestock emergency benefits (not to exceed $50,000), or a combination of payments and benefits specified by the person.

SEC. 110. NO DOUBLE PAYMENTS ON REPLANTED ACREAGE.

(a) REDUCTION OF DISASTER PAYMENTS.—Effective only for producers on a farm who receive disaster payments under this subtitle for a crop of a commodity, the Secretary of Agriculture shall reduce such payments by an amount that reflects the value of any crop such producers plant for harvest in 1989 to replace the crop for which disaster payments are received.

(b) REPLACEMENT CROPS.—For purposes of subsection (a), a crop shall be considered to be planted to replace the crop for which disaster payments are received if (because of loss or damage to the first crop due to damaging weather or related condition in 1988 or 1989) the second crop is planted on acreage on which the producers planted, or were prevented from planting, the first crop.

(c) ADMINISTRATION.—In carrying out this section, the Secretary shall—

(1) determine the value of the second crop based on the actual yield of the producers and average market prices for the second crop during a representative period; and

(2) take into account the historical cropping patterns of producers.

SEC. 111. SUBSTITUTION OF CROP INSURANCE PROGRAM YIELDS.

(a) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Secretary of Agriculture may permit each eligible producer (as defined in subsection (d)) of a 1989 crop of a commodity who has obtained multiperil crop insurance for such crop (or, as provided in subsection (c), who obtained multiperil crop insurance for the producer's 1988 crop of such commodity) under the Federal Crop Insurance Act (7 U.S.C. 1501 et seq.) to substitute, at the discretion of the producer, the crop insurance yield for such crop, as established under such Act, for the farm yield otherwise assigned to the producer under this subtitle, for the purposes of determining such producer's eligibility for a disaster payment on the 1989 crop under this subtitle and the amount of such payment.

(b) ADJUSTMENT OF ADVANCED DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, if an eligible producer of wheat, feed grains, cotton, or rice elects to substitute yields for such producer's 1989 crop under subsection (a), the producer's eligibility for a waiver or repayment of an advance deficiency payment on such crop under this subtitle shall be adjusted as provided in paragraph (2).

(2) AMOUNT.—The amount of production of such crop on which the producer otherwise would be eligible for waiver of repayment of advance deficiency payments under this subtitle shall be reduced by an amount of production equal to the difference between—

(A) the amount of production eligible for disaster payments under this subtitle using a substituted yield under this section; and

(B) the amount of production that would have been eligible for disaster payments using the farm program payment yield otherwise assigned to the producer under this subtitle.

(c) MULTIPERIL CROP INSURANCE NOT AVAILABLE.—A producer may use the crop insurance yield for the producer's 1988 crop of a commodity for purposes of substituting yields under subsection (a) if the producer demonstrates to the Secretary that, through no fault of the producer, multiperil crop insurance under the Federal Crop Insurance Act was not made available to the producer for the producer's 1989 crop of the commodity.

(d) DEFINITION OF ELIGIBLE PRODUCER.—For purposes of this section, the term "eligible producer" means a producer of the 1989 crop of wheat, feed grains, upland cotton, extra long staple cotton, rice, or soybeans.

Amend the title so as to read as follows: "An Act to provide disaster assistance to agricultural producers, and for other purposes.".

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I am pleased that the House and Senate have finally agreed on a drought relief package. It is basically, the Senate proposal. I believe that is important because only our package recognized that there were priority needs on the disaster front, especially for crops that were planted last fall, winter wheat among them, which is raised in my State of Kansas, and where the drought really had an impact, and not only Kansas, but five or six other States in the Midwest. We did not open the Treasury gates for every crop in America. We said loud and clear that farmers who were clobbered by drought or flood who produced program crops—I might indicate that flood was the culprit which devastated many of the crops in the State of Louisiana—and put up with Government redtape; and producers who signed up in the crop insurance program, these are the producers who deserve priority attention, and they are getting it.

No doubt about it, winter wheat farmers will be pleased to know the specifics of the disaster relief because they will be back in the field planting next month.

Let me reiterate the three points that I see are the clear merits of this disaster relief bill. As I have stated, we have provided much deserved distinctions based on burden sharing and crop insurance: Winter wheat farmers and other program participants with crop insurance will get last year's rate of 35/65. Other program crops will be 40/65, soybeans and other oilseeds will get a 45/65 formula and finally nonprogram crops and nonparticipants will be limited to a 50/65 rate.

Let me point out that payments to nonprogram crops are taken out of payments that would have gone to program crops. It all gets very complicated but it means that corn producers, cotton producers, wheat producers, so-called program crops in effect are paying the entire bill, and about 200 million dollars will go to nonprogram crop producers with a 50-percent loss—tomatoes, peaches, cherries, and others. These nonprogram crops do not have any restrictions on what they can do, but they will still be getting paid at a good rate because of the way the bill is finally drafted.

We have scaled back the number of nonprogram crops by requiring a 50-percent loss threshold. We have also kept the bill within budget, which is about $900 million. The House bill was about $1.4 billion. We have also kept in the bill a provision that is fair and extremely significant for Kansas and other wheat producers in Oklahoma, Texas, Nebraska, North and South Dakota, some in Colorado and some in Missouri, the so-called 0/92 option.

The House bill does contain a requirement that producers with a 65-percent loss who get disaster benefits must buy crop insurance the following year. There is some flexibility for waivers based in part on the cost of the insurance premium and whether there is economic hardship.

I would simply note for the record that some members have a problem with this mandated approach because of the numerous difficulties the crop insurance program has had.

I again point out the reason we were compelled to make some distinctions—nonprogram crops do not set aside any acres, do not comply with any regulations. They get paid regardless. So I would just suggest it is not a perfect bill, but I do believe it is one that will be helpful to those who have already suffered disasters in winter wheat areas and others who may suffer disasters in the spring crops, States like North Dakota and Minnesota and others. So I am very pleased that the House agreed almost totally to the Senate passed bill, that we are now in a position to pass the bill and send it to the President, who has agreed to sign it because it is within the budget.

I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, will the distinguished President pro tempore yield.

Mr. BYRD. Yes, I will be happy to yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. President, I would like to associate myself with the remarks the distinguished Senator from Kansas has made about this disaster relief bill.

I think one point that should not be overlooked is the fact that 3 weeks ago the administration was suggesting it would be very unlikely to get approval of any disaster relief legislation in view of the bill passed in the other body, but we have come a long way, working with the administration, with Senators on both sides of the aisle, and with the other body to craft a conference report that is not only going to pass the Senate today but also be signed by the President, I predict, in a timely manner.

I rise to congratulate all of those who have worked so hard to bring us to this point, and I urge the President to sign this bill. It is a good bill. It is going to provide a lot of important relief for many who have been damaged by floods and others by drought. It is a very important bill that we pass today.

I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. BYRD. I thank my friend from Mississippi.

I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the Senate amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR CHILDREN'S EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the bill by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 797) to amend the Communications Act of 1914.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 797) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to improve the education of children by establishing a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television, and for other purposes, which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, with amendments, as follows:

(The parts of the bill intended to be stricken are shown in boldface brackets, and the parts of the bill intended to be inserted are shown in italic.)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Endowment for Children's Educational Television Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) children in the United States are lagging behind those in other countries in fundamental intellectual skills, including reading, writing, mathematics, science, and geography;

(2) these fundamental skills are essential for the future governmental and industrial leadership of the United States;

(3) the United States must act now to greatly improve the education of its children;

(4) television is watched by children about three hours each day on average and can be effective in teaching children;

(5) educational television programming for children is aired too infrequently either because public broadcast licensees and permittees lack funds or because commercial broadcast licensees and permittees or cable television system operators do not have the economic incentive; and

(6) the Federal Government can assist in the creation of children's educational television by establishing a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television to supplement the children's educational programming funded by other [Government] government entities.

SEC. 3. (a) Part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 390 et seq.) is amended—

(1) by redesignating section 394 as section 393A;

(2) by redesignating subparts B, C, and D as subparts C, D, and E, respectively; and

(3) by inserting immediately after section 393A, as so redesignated, the following new subpart:

SUBPART B—NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR CHILDREN'S EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION

"ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ENDOWMENT

"SEC. 394. (a) It is the purpose of this section to enhance the education of children through the creation and production of television programming specifically directed toward the development of fundamental intellectual skills.

"(b) There is established, under the direction of the Secretary, a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television. In administering the National Endowment, the Secretary is authorized to make grants to persons proposing to create and produce educational television programming for children. The Secretary shall consult with the Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television in the making of the grants. The grants shall be made on the condition that the [programing] programming shall—

"(1) during the first two years after its production, be made available only to public television licensees and permittees and noncommercial television licensees and permittees; and

"(2) thereafter be made available to any commercial television licensee or permittee or cable television system operator, at a charge established by the Secretary that will [assue] assure the maximum practicable distribution of such programming, so long as such licensee, permittee, or operator does not interrupt the programming with commercial advertisements.

The Secretary may, consistent with the purpose and provisions of this section, permit the programming to be distributed to persons using other media, establish conditions relating to such distribution, and apply those conditions to any grant. The Secretary may waive the requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection if the Secretary finds that neither public television licensees and permittees nor noncommercial television licensees and permittees will have an opportunity to air such programming in the first two years after its production.

"(c)(1) The Secretary, with the advice of the Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television, shall establish criteria for making grants under this section. Such criteria shall be consistent with the purpose and provisions of this section and shall be made available to interested parties upon request.

"(2) Applications for grants under this section shall be submitted to the Secretary in such form and containing such information as the Secretary shall require by regulation.

"(d) Upon approving any application under this section, the Secretary shall make a grant to the applicant in an amount determined by the Secretary, except that such amounts shall not exceed 75 per centum of the amount determined by the Secretary to be the reasonable and necessary cost of the project for which the grant is made.

"(e)(1) The Secretary shall establish an Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television. The Secretary shall appoint ten individuals as members of the Advisory Council and designate one of such members to serve as Chairman.

"(2) Members of the Advisory Council shall have terms of two years, and no member shall serve for more than three consecutive terms. The members shall have expertise in the fields of education, psychology, child development, or television programming, or related disciplines. Officers and employees of the United States shall not be appointed as members.

"(3) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of duties for the Advisory Council, the members of the Advisory Council shall serve without compensation but shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in accordance with 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

"(4) The Advisory Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman and shall advise the Secretary concerning the making of grants under this section.

"(f)(1) Each recipient of a grant under this section shall keep such records as may be reasonably necessary to enable the Secretary to carry out the Secretary's functions under this section, including records which fully disclose the amount and the disposition by such recipient of the proceeds of such grant, the total cost of the project, the amount and nature of that portion of the cost of the project supplied by other sources, and such other records as will facilitate an effective audit.

"(2) The Secretary and the Comptroller General of the United States, or any of their duly authorized representatives, shall have access for the purposes of audit and examination to any books, documents, papers, and records of the recipient that are pertinent to a grant received under this section.

"(g) The Secretary is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out this section, including those relating to the order of priority in approving applications for projects under this section or to determining the amounts of grants for such projects.

"(h) There are authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 to be used by the Secretary to carry out the provisions of this section. Sums appropriated under this subsection for any fiscal year shall remain available for payment of grants for projects for which applications approved under this section have been submitted within one year after the last day of such fiscal year.

"(i) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'educational television programming for children' means any television program which is directed to an audience of children who are 16 years of age or younger and which is designed for the intellectual development of those children, except that such term does not include any television program which is directed to a general audience but which might also be viewed by a significant number of children; and

"(2) the term 'person' means an individual, partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, corporation, or State or local governmental entity.".

(b) Section 397 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 397) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2) by striking "subpart C" and inserting in lieu thereof "subpart D"; and

(2) in paragraph (15)—

(A) by inserting "and subpart B" immediately after "subpart A"; and

(B) by striking "subpart B, subpart C" and inserting in lieu thereof "subpart C, subpart D".

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, I have long been a supporter of improving the education we provide to the youth in this country, and I have long been a supporter of using television to help achieve this objective. About a decade ago, I cosponsored legislation to further the use of television as an education tool by establishing an endowment for children's educational programming. The time was not ripe then for that bill to move. But, times have changed. We all now recognize the fundamental importance of education to our Nation's future and the positive role that television can play in education. We should now move forward to enact legislation to create a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television. I want to congratulate the chairman of the Communications Subcommittee, Senator INOUYE, for leading this effort.

The Endowment legislation (S. 797) will provide funding for children's educational programming at the modest level of $10 million in fiscal year 1990. It is designed to maximize distribution of this programming by encouraging the use of this programming by commercial media after a first run on noncommercial and educational television. This legislation does not require commercial broadcasters or cable operators to carry educational programs. Instead, it will make the programming available at a low cost, a cost that will be substantially lower than the normal cost of production.

Our children watch television. Study after study has demonstrated that children from all socioeconomic backgrounds will watch educational programming if it is available. The problem is that there is not enough available.

Almost all of the educational programming for children has come from public broadcasting. These public broadcasters and program producers are to be congratulated. Their effort has been truly impressive. "Sesame Street," "Reading Rainbow," and all of the other programs on public broadcasting are not just television shows, they are now ingrained in our culture. Virtually every child in America knows Mr. Rogers, Big Bird, the Cookie Monster, Oscar the Grouch, and LeVar Burton, the star of "Reading Rainbow." What's more, our children have learned so much from them.

But, public broadcasting too has constraints. Its budget is limited. It also is charged with meeting important needs of our Nation's adults and thus has a limited number of broadcast hours. We can cure the first problem with more money; the second one, however, requires another approach.

We all know why commercial broadcasters do not air children's educational programming. It does not pay. While we could and should place certain obligations on them to meet the needs of the children's audience, this too has limits. What we need to do is change their incentives and encourage them to air quality programming to educate our children.

The endowment approach seeks to help create this incentive for commercial broadcasters, as well as to further fund public broadcasting's efforts. Its goal is simple: create more, first-rate educational programming and then distribute it first to public broadcasters and then to commercial broadcasters, as well as to other media.

Today, we take a major step toward achieving this goal. We have an obligation to give our children the best education possible—for their own benefit and for what it means to our Nation. I urge all of my colleagues to support S. 797.

Mr. INOUYE. Mr. President, the Senate now has before it legislation important to our future. This bill, S. 797, seeks to improve the education of our youth by establishing a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television. This is not a new idea, but it is an idea whose time has come.

This Endowment would be lodged in the Department of Commerce's National Telecommunications and Information Administration. This agency already has experience with this type of grant program since it manages the existing Public Telecommunications Facilities Program. Grants would be made to people who wish to produce children's educational programming under the conditions that: First, programs be made available first only to public broadcasting—for 2 years; and second, others can then obtain the programming under conditions that ensure its maximum distribution, so long as the programming is not interrupted by commercial advertisements. Finally, an advisory council of individuals from the private sector who are experts in such fields as education, child development, and programming would be created to advise the agency on the awarding of grants.

S. 797 authorizes $10 million for the Endowment in fiscal year 1990. I believe that far more is needed to achieve the goals of this legislation and to have a significant impact on the intellectual skills of our children. This is only a beginning: I would hope, for example, that the private sector will contribute generously to the Endowment. It certainly is in their interest that the goals of this legislation be reached.

Our country is facing an educational crisis. Over the past year, a host of studies has demonstrated that students in the United States are lagging badly behind those of the rest of the world. A disturbingly large percentage of our children cannot read, add and subtract, or understand the meaning of important events. Yet, we expect them to find gainful employment and to lead our Nation in the next century.

There are an estimated 42 million children in this country, and they each spend anywhere from 11 to 28 hours a week watching television. By the time most children reach the age of 18, it is estimated that they will have watched 1,500 hours of television. Other than sleep, watching television is what children do most. Moreover, children from families with lower income watch more television and rely more heavily on it for information. Finally, television has been shown to be an efficient and effective way to reach and educate children both in the home and school.

There is no dispute that the workplace is becoming increasingly more complex and sophisticated. Research, however, indicates that the work force is not prepared for modern jobs. Many workers are not prepared for even lower level jobs, as can be seen from the huge amounts of money industry is spending to improve the education of their workers.

Our high schools graduate 700,000 functionally illiterate young people every year and another 700,000 drop out before completing high school. According to the Bureau of Census, in 1982, between 17 and 21 million U.S. adults were illiterate. Moreover, many adults and students who can read and write cannot apply these skills to the tasks required in today's workplace. Many entry level positions today require workers to be able to solve practical problems they are not trained to address.

In addition to the high illiteracy rate in this country, the recent "Report to the Nation on the Future of Mathematics Education" by the National Research Council concluded that the United States is experiencing a decline in mathematical skills and interest. For example, in 1987, only 55 percent of the 700 tellers hired by Chemical Bank passed an eighth grade level mathematics test. In 1983, more than 70 percent passed the test. In addition, from 1976 to 1986, high school student interest in mathematics declined by 50 percent. Only 8 percent of the current work force consists of scientists and engineers.

The results of the "Second International Math Study" 1982, cited in the National Research Council report indicate that the performance of the top 5 percent of United States math students is matched by the top 50 percent of students in Japan. In addition, the top 1 percent of U.S. students scored lowest of the top 1 percent of all participating countries. Thus, our best math students ranked the lowest when compared to their counterparts in other countries.

Further, according to the National Research Council report, "non-Asian minorities—blacks, Hispanics, and native Americans—are significantly underrepresented in all scientific, engineering and professional fields" because of a lack of proper foundation in math. The percentage of blacks and Hispanics receiving doctoral degrees in mathematical sciences has averaged 10 per year since 1974. This is particularly distressing because so many mathematics professionals are teachers and role models. Blacks and Hispanics will soon be in the majority in this country; yet they will continue to be underrepresented in the faculty in our schools and universities. These data are particularly depressing when considered in conjunction with the fact that the percentage of black and Hispanics enrolled in college declined from 1976 to 1986 from 33.5 percent to 28.6 percent for blacks and 35.8 percent to 29.4 percent for Hispanics.

There is a great deal of evidence that television can effectively teach children. In an article in "American Psychologist," Aletha Huston notes:

> [V]iewing "Mister Rogers Neighborhood" leads to increased prosocial behavior, task persistence and imaginative play. * * * [By watching] "Sesame Street" * * * preschool children learned many of the skills and concepts taught on the program.

Research also demonstrates that the program "Reading Rainbow" encourages reading of the books featured in the program. There is a marked increase in the number of books sold and checked out of libraries after a book is featured on the program.

Today, public television is the primary source of educational children's programming in the United States. Over $40 million is spent each year to produce and make available over 1,200 hours of children's educational programming available for broadcast on public television. This amount, however, pales in comparison to that in other countries.

Japan and Britain, for example, have clearly recognized the important role that television plays in education. Japan relies very heavily on in-school use of television to educate children. In Japan, 93 percent of the public schools have access to 122 educational programs per week and use an average of 33.5 hours of instructional programming per week.

The British take a different approach to children's programming. All stations, commercial and noncommercial, are required to carry educational and informative programming aimed at children. In 1983-84, stations were required to carry 3.5 hours of children's informative programming and 2.5 hours of children's instructional programming; they also provided almost 7 hours of school instructional programming. These amounts mirror the children's programming carried on the BBC, the British equivalent of our public broadcasting system. In addition, the British produce far more new programs each year than we do.

While the United States lags behind other countries in producing educational programming, we have had many successes, such as "Sesame Street" and "Reading Rainbow." But, it is very difficult to increase the number of programs because they are so expensive. Educational programs, in addition to the normal production costs, require a great deal of research and the involvement of educators at all stages of production. Moreover, for commercial broadcasters there is little incentive to broadcast programs like "Reading Rainbow" because they are designed for a narrow audience and therefore the revenue from the programs tends to be limited. Thus, public television is the primary outlet for such programming.

Public television, however, also has limitations on airing children's programs. It has the responsibility to provide programming aimed at adults whose interests are not served by commercial television. For public television, there are so many hours when programs can be aired, and resources are limited.

From all that I have said, it is clear that we have a variety of problems that must be remedied. That is why I introduced S. 747, to create a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television, and why I am urging its adoption. We need to devote greater attention to the educational needs or our Nation's youth; we require additional funding; and we need to encourage commercial broadcasters and other commercial media to show this type of programming. More people have televisions in their homes than indoor plumbing. Television is a powerful and effective medium which we are underutilizing.

I strongly believe this legislation is an important component of our efforts to enhance our children's education. It has been demonstrated that television is an effective teacher, and we must harness it for the good of our children and our Nation. I commend this bill to my colleagues and urge its immediate adoption.

Mr. HEINZ, Mr. President, I am pleased to join the distinguished chairman of the Subcommittee on Communications, Senator INOUYE, in cosponsoring the National Endowment for Children's Educational Television Act of 1989. Since my election to the Senate in 1976, I have supported the establishment of such an endowment. Until today, there has been little movement toward specific initiatives to encourage the development of quality children's programming; Mister Rogers and Big Bird can only do so much.

Clearly it is time for us to begin to offer our children a wider menu of TV choices. We cannot legislate limited consumption of TV, but we can make the diet more nutritious.

We may try to curb it, but our Nation's children have a demonstrated appetite for television. Most studies agree that children watch TV at least 3 hours each day but that educational programming is aired far too infrequently. Our children need more constructive intellectual stimulation than Mutant Teenage Ninja Turtles provide.

Our children are being bombarded with the televised exploits of ridiculous space heroes and fantasy villains of every description. Television all too often translates emotions into physical violence rather than thoughtful behavior, and children learn that many problems can be solved by violence and those that cannot, can be solved by Vanna White turning a letter and winning a lifetime of prizes.

Children's TV programming can be a more positive learning experience than it has been. Quality programming can teach kids to be more critical and discriminating consumers of television. Quality programming can provide the positive models of verbal and emotional expression necessary for healthy development.

I strongly believe that the creation of an endowment for children's programming will provide a catalyst for the production of useful, thoughtful and creative educational viewing.

This legislation will make available $10 million to create and produce educational television programming for children. The Secretary of Commerce and an advisory council on children's educational television, made up of experts in the fields of education, psychology, child development and television programming would establish criteria for the award of grants.

For the first time, we would have a dedicated source of funding for the purpose of producing educational television. Our children should not be the victims of political fights over Corporation for Public Broadcasting funding. The CPB does the best it can with what it has, but it is not enough.

Mr. President, as we celebrate the 20th anniversary of Sesame Street we ought to recognize that our society has dramatically changed over these past two decades. Children are spending more unsupervised time at home. Clearly there is a need for programs that reach the same level of excellence as Mister Rogers Neighborhood or Sesame Street, but that can also reach a broader school-aged audience.

I urge my colleagues to join me in this effort. No one disputes that the future of this country depends on our children's educational skills. I think it's safe to say that this proposal could have a very positive effect on the direction our country will take into the 1990's and beyond.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (S. 797), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 797

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Endowment for Children's Educational Television Act of 1989".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds that—

(1) children in the United States are lagging behind those in other countries in fundamental intellectual skills, including reading, writing, mathematics, science, and geography;

(2) these fundamental skills are essential for the future governmental and industrial leadership of the United States;

(3) the United States must act now to greatly improve the education of its children;

(4) television is watched by children about three hours each day on average and can be effective in teaching children;

(5) educational television programming for children is aired too infrequently either because public broadcast licensees and permittees lack funds or because commercial broadcast licensees and permittees or cable television system operators do not have the economic incentive; and

(6) the Federal Government can assist in the creation of children's educational television by establishing a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television to supplement the children's educational programming funded by other government entities.

SEC. 3. (a) Part IV of title III of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 390 et seq.) is amended—

(1) by redesignating section 394 as section 393A;

(2) by redesignating subparts B, C, and D as subparts C, D, and E, respectively; and

(3) by inserting immediately after section 393A, as so designated, the following new subpart:

"SUBPART B—NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR CHILDREN'S EDUCATIONAL TELEVISION

"ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL ENDOWMENT

"SEC. 394. (a) It is the purpose of this section to enhance the education of children through the creation and production of television programming specifically directed toward the development of fundamental intellectual skills.

"(b) There is established, under the direction of the Secretary, a National Endowment for Children's Educational Television. In administering the National Endowment, the Secretary is authorized to make grants to persons proposing to create and produce educational television programming for children. The Secretary shall consult with the Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television in the making of the grants. The grants shall be made on the condition that the programming shall—

"(1) during the first two years after its production, be made available only to public television licensees and permittees and noncommercial television licensees and permittees; and

"(2) thereafter be made available to any commercial television licensee or permittee or cable television system operator, at a charge established by the Secretary that will assure the maximum practicable distribution of such programming, so long as such licensee, permittee, or operator does not interrupt the programming with commercial advertisements.

The Secretary may, consistent with the purpose and provisions of this section, permit the programming to be distributed to persons using other media, establish conditions relating to such distribution, and apply those conditions to any grant. The Secretary may waive the requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection if the Secretary finds that neither public television licensees and permittees nor noncommercial television licensees and permittees will have an opportunity to air such programming in the first two years after its production.

"(c)(1) The Secretary, with the advice of the Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television, shall establish criteria for making grants under this section. Such criteria shall be consistent with the purpose and provisions of this section and shall be made available to interested parties upon request.

"(2) Applications for grants under this section shall be submitted to the Secretary in such form and containing such information as the Secretary shall require by regulation.

"(d) Upon approving any application under this section, the Secretary shall make a grant to the applicant in an amount determined by the Secretary, except that such amounts shall not exceed 75 per centum of the amount determined by the Secretary to be the reasonable and necessary cost of the project for which the grant is made.

"(e)(1) The Secretary shall establish an Advisory Council on Children's Educational Television. The Secretary shall appoint ten individuals as members of the Advisory Council and designate one of such members to serve as Chairman.

"(2) Members of the Advisory Council shall have terms of two years, and no member shall serve for more than three consecutive terms. The members shall have expertise in the fields of education, psychology, child development, or television programming, or related disciplines. Officers and employees of the United States shall not be appointed as members.

"(3) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of duties for the Advisory Council, the members of the Advisory Council shall serve without compensation but shall be allowed travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence, in accordance with 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

"(4) The Advisory Council shall meet at the call of the Chairman and shall advise the Secretary concerning the making of grants under this section.

"(f)(1) Each recipient of a grant under this section shall keep such records as may be reasonably necessary to enable the Secretary to carry out the Secretary's functions under this section, including records which fully disclose the amount and the disposition by such recipient of the proceeds of such grant, the total cost of the project, the amount and nature of that portion of the cost of the project supplied by other sources, and such other records as will facilitate an effective audit.

"(2) The Secretary and the Comptroller General of the United States, or any of their duly authorized representatives, shall have access for the purpose of audit and examination to any books, documents, papers, and records of the recipient that are pertinent to a grant received under his section.

"(g) The Secretary is authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out this section, including those relating to the order of priority in approving applications for projects under this section or to determining the amounts of grants for such projects.

"(h) There are authorized to be appropriated $10,000,000 for fiscal year 1990 to be used by the Secretary to carry out the provisions of this section. Sums appropriated under this subsection for any fiscal year shall remain available for payment of grants for projects for which applications approved under this section have been submitted within one year after the last day of such fiscal year.

"(i) For purposes of this section—

"(1) the term 'educational television programming for children' means any television program which is directed to an audience of children who are 16 years of age or younger and which is designed for the intellectual development of those children, except that such term does not include any television program which is directed to a general audience but which might also be viewed by a significant number of children; and

"(2) the term 'person' means an individual, partnership, association, joint stock company, trust, corporation, or State or local governmental entity.".

(b) Section 397 of the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. 397) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (2) by striking "subpart C" and inserting in lieu thereof "subpart D"; and

(2) in paragraph (15)—

(A) by inserting "and subpart B" immediately after "subpart A"; and

(B) by striking "subpart B, subpart C" and inserting in lieu thereof "subpart C, subpart D".

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. COCHRAN. I move to lay the motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

CASH MANAGEMENT BY EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Governmental Affairs Committee be discharged from further consideration of S. 926, a bill to improve the cash management by executive agencies, and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 926) to improve cash management by executive agencies, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHELBY). Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I am pleased that the Senate considers today S. 926, the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1989. This bill was introduced on May 4 of this year by myself and my distinguished colleague from Delaware, Senator ROTH.

Senator ROTH and I introduced a similar bill, S. 1381, in the 100th Congress. It was favorably reported from the Governmental Affairs Committee last year, was unanimously approved by the Senate, and was the subject of a House committee hearing. However, the 100th Congress adjourned before the House could take action on S. 1381.

Senator ROTH and I are confident that the passage of S. 926 by the Senate will be rewarded, this year, by final enactment. On July 26, 1989, the Committee on Governmental Affairs considered S. 926 and voted unanimously to report it favorably to the full Senate.

This legislation has the support of the General Accounting Office, the Office of Management and Budget, and the Department of the Treasury. It also has the enthusiastic backing of the National Association of State Auditors, Comptrollers and Treasurers, and the National Association of State Budget Officers.

S. 926 will improve the efficiency with which billions of dollars of Federal funds are transferred to States to enable them to carry out Federal programs. Its goal is to ensure that neither a State, nor the Federal Government, is out-of-pocket an undue length of time as a result of these transfers. Our bill seeks to narrow the time between the transfer of Federal funds—whether an advancement, or a reimbursement—and the time when those funds are paid out by a State for program purposes.

Thus, the cash management bill would prevent State governments from drawing down Federal funds too far ahead of schedule. By the same token, it would keep States from incurring a fiscal penalty when they advance their own funds, and then experience delays in Federal reimbursement.

The way this will be accomplished is by the reciprocal calculation of interest on Federal or State cash advances, pending their payout for program purposes. Our bill provides that each State, and the Federal Government, will enter into an agreement covering funding for all Federal assistance programs in which the State participates. The interest obligation provides a mutual incentive for State and Federal agencies to see that the transfer of Federal funds coincides as closely as possible to actual payments to program recipients.

For instance, if a State requires Federal funds on hand before it can lawfully issue checks, it will be able to have them. The State will simply be accountable for interest while the Federal funds are on deposit in the State's banks, until the time when those funds are paid to redeem the State's checks. By the same token, when it is the State that has advanced its own funds for Federal program purposes, the Federal Government will be liable for interest from the time while the State is out-of-pocket, until Federal reimbursement is forthcoming.

Actual payment or setoff of interest between a State and the Federal Government would be performed annually. Last year, the Congressional Budget Office estimated that when fully implemented, the cash management bill would result in a net payment balance of $45 to $50 million in the Federal taxpayer's favor. But I can tell you that nearly all the States we have heard from, including my home State of Tennessee, favor the bill strongly. It ensures predictability in Federal funding, which assists the States' own investment strategies. Through astute management of the Federal money they have on hand, States will suffer no adverse impact from our bill. Let me emphasize that it is intended as a make-whole bill, not a money maker for either a State or the Federal Government.

The present cash management bill was developed by a joint Federal/State cash management reform task force, which was formed in 1983. The interest calculation-and-setoff formula was successfully pilot-tested by four States: Virginia, Indiana, Wisconsin, and California.

The efforts of the task force were followed by intensive work within the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee, first on a bill introduced in the 99th Congress by Senator ROTH, and in the 100th Congress on the ROTH-SASSER bill, S. 1381. As a result of hearing testimony and continuing discussions among Federal executive agencies, States, and congressional staff, we have made some changes that are reflected in S. 926.

Thus, S. 926 provides that should the Secretary of the Treasury financially penalize a Federal agency for failing to adhere to proper cash disbursement guidelines, any penalty assessed will come from agency operating funds, not program funds intended for disbursement to the States.

Our bill also specifies that States are not to be charged for interest that they are required to retain for program purposes. For example, a number of Federal programs specifically comprehend that States will retain and plow back interest on undisbursed funds. These include certain revolving funds accounts, such as national direct student loans, and certain construction programs, such as those authorized by the Clean Water Act. So it would be anomalous to demand back the interest earned by States from investing funds for these programs.

Finally, S. 926 makes an important distinction concerning State withdrawals from their accounts at the Unemployment Trust Fund. Although the money in question belongs to the individual States, the Secretary of the Treasury is required by statute to invest the fund as a single entity. In order not to diminish the earning power of the fund, it is important that a State return to its account any outside interest it earns when it draws down an advance from its account. Before returning this interest, however, our bill first permits the State to net out the costs it is charged by a bank to handle these drawdowns. Otherwise, the State would bear these banking costs as an out-of-pocket expense for using its own money. That is not what we intend, and our bill so indicates.

In conclusion, Mr. President, the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1989 embodies much-needed legislation which has already received considerable study and unanimous approval from the Senate. It will improve the efficiency of Federal funds transfers, and insure that neither the Federal nor State taxpayer is disadvantaged by having Government money sit idle too long.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, on May 4 of this year Senator SASSER and I introduced S. 926, the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1989 to the 101st Congress. This bill embodies the essence of title IV of the omnibus Federal financial management bill, S. 2230, the Federal Management Reorganization and Cost Control Act of 1986 I introduced in the 99th Congress. Although S. 2230 was reported unanimously from the Governmental Affairs Committee, it was never considered on the Senate floor. Two years ago, during the first session of the 100th Congress, Senator SASSER joined with me in introducing this title on its own as the Cash Management Improvement Act of 1987, S. 1381. This bill passed the Senate unanimously, but never had a vote in the House of Representatives.

For many years, intergovernmental financing methods have been an area of friction between the State and Federal Governments. All sides to this problem have been well noted. The States are known to draw down Federal Funds sooner than necessary. By the same token, the Federal Government has not always allowed the States their Federal funds on time so that they must use their own funds to Finance Federal programs. It was clear that both parties had to develop viable solutions. With the urging of Congress, the Federal/State Cash Management Reform Task Force was created. The core of the Task Force's findings are encompassed in this legislation.

I want to say a little about why this bill authorizes the exchange of interest between the Federal Government and the States. The interest exchange provision in the bill provides an incentive for the timely exchange of funds. If this were a perfect world, this provision would not be needed. But, unfortunately, experience has shown that states don't always get funds from the Federal Government when they need them, and not all states have historically waited until they need funds, to draw them down. Clearly, we must develop cash transfer policies that are fair, uniform, predictable and enforceable.

It is also important to point out that States need not choose a funding option that calls for the interest exchange. Options are available that would not require the exchange of interest, and the U.S. Treasury will work with States to ensure a mutually agreeable option for the drawing down of funds. The bill calls for the establishment of cash management practices which allow that neither the Federal or State Governments prosper or suffer financially as the result of the transfer of funds.

I think it noteworthy that both the National Association of State Auditors, Comptrollers and Treasurers and the National Association of State Budget Officers have called for enactment of the ideas in this legislation. These groups have had members on the State/Federal Cash Management Reform Task Force since its inception, and they endorse the content of the bill, which closely follows the legislation developed by the Task Force.

When I first introduced this legislation in 1986, I had the Congressional Budget Office look at it for cost savings. They concluded, based on past Treasury information, that this idea should save the Federal Government between $35 to $50 million a year. This bill can be a key to building up a strong level of trust and confidence in the intergovernmental financing process, as it is based on tested principles that have been mutually decided upon. This is a timely piece of legislation in both concept and result. I am very pleased that we are taking action on it today.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered as having been read the third time, passed, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 926) was passed as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Cash Management Improvement Act of 1989".

PURPOSE

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to increase equity in the exchange of funds between the Federal Government and the States and to increase the efficiency of efforts to manage cash throughout the Government by providing additional procedures and incentives for cash management.

DISBURSEMENT OBJECTIVES

SEC. 3. (a) Subchapter II of chapter 37 of title 31, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3720B. Disbursement of Federal funds

"Each head of an executive agency (other than the Tennessee Valley Authority) shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, provide for the timely disbursement of Federal funds through cash, checks, electronic funds transfer, or any other means identified by the Secretary. The Secretary may collect from any executive agency which does not comply with the preceding sentence a charge in an amount the Secretary determines to be the cost to the general fund of the Treasury caused by such noncompliance. The amounts of the charges paid under this section shall be deposited in the Treasury and credited as miscellaneous receipts. Any charge assessed by the Secretary under this section shall, to the maximum extent practicable, be paid out of appropriations available for agency operations and shall not reduce program funding levels.".

(b) The chapter analysis for chapter 37 of such title is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 3720A the following new item:

"3720B. Disbursement of Federal funds.".

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe regulations, including the regulations required under section 3720B of title 31, United States Code (as added by subsection 3(a) of this Act) to ensure the full implementation of such section 3720B by October 1, 1988.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST

SEC. 4. (a) Section 6501 of title 31, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by redesignating clauses (7), (8), and (9) as clauses (8), (9), and (10), respectively;

(2) by inserting after clause (6) the following new clause:

"(7) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of the Treasury."; and

(3) by striking out clause (9) (as redesignated by subparagraph (A) of this paragraph) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(9) 'State' means a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, a territory or possession of the United States, and an agency, instrumentality, or fiscal agent of a State but does not mean a local government of a State.".

(b)(1) Section 6503 of title 31, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"§ 6503. Intergovernmental financing

"(a) Consistent with program purposes and with regulations of the Secretary, and by means mutually agreed upon by the Secretary and a State, the head of an executive agency carrying out a program shall schedule the transfer of funds to minimize the time elapsing between transfer of funds from the United States Treasury and the issuance or redemption of checks, warrants, or payments by other means by a State.

"(b) Consistent with program purposes and with regulations of the Secretary, and by means mutually agreed upon by the Secretary and a State, a State shall minimize the time elapsing between transfer of funds from the United States Treasury and the issuance or redemption of checks, warrants, or payments by other means for program purposes.

"(c)(1) The Secretary shall issue regulations that shall require a State, when not inconsistent with program purposes to pay interest on funds from the time that funds are deposited to the State's account until the time that funds are paid out in order to redeem checks or warrants or make payments by other means for program purposes. Except as provided under paragraph (3)(B) (relating to the Unemployment Trust Fund), the interest payable under this subsection shall be calculated at a rate equal to the average of the bond equivalent rates of 13-week Treasury bills auctioned during the period for which interest is calculated, as determined by the Secretary.

"(2) Amounts received as payment of interest under this subsection shall be deposited in the Treasury and credited as miscellaneous receipts, except as provided in paragraph (3) of this subsection.

"(3)(A) If interest is paid under paragraph (1) of this subsection on funds paid to a State from a trust fund for which the Secretary of the Treasury is the trustee, such interest shall be credited to such trust fund. If interest is paid under subsection (d) of this section as a result of a State disbursing its own funds for programs for which the Secretary of the Treasury is the trustee, such interest shall be charged against such trust fund.

"(B) Nothwithstanding any other provision of this section, the interest paid by a State, on funds drawn from its account in the Unemployment Trust Fund, shall be returned to that account and shall consist of actual interest earnings by the State, less related banking costs incurred by the State, for the period for which interest is calculated.

"(d) If a State disburses its own funds for program purposes in accordance with Federal law, regulation, or Federal-State agreement, the State shall be entitled to interest from the time when the State's funds are paid out to redeem checks or warrants, or make payments by other means, until the Federal funds are deposited to the State's bank account. The Secretary shall pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts as may be necessary for interest owed to a State under this subsection. Such interest shall be calculated, at a rate equal to the average of the bond equivalent rates of 13-week Treasury bills auctioned during the period for which interest is calculated, as determined by the Secretary.

"(e) The budget submitted by the President under section 1105 of this title for a fiscal year shall include a statement specifying, for the most recently completed fiscal year, amounts of interest paid to the Federal Government under subsection (c) of this section and payments of interest to States under subsection (d) of this section.

"(f) If a State receives refunds of funds, the State shall return those refunds to the executive agency administering the program or apply those funds to reduce the amount of funds owed to the State under such program. Interest earned on such refunds shall be considered when setting overall interest obligations between the State and the Federal Government as required by this section.

"(g) If the Federal Government makes a payment to a recipient under a Federal program, and a portion of the payment is an amount which the Federal Government is paying to such recipient on behalf of a State, such amount shall be considered to be a transfer of funds between the Federal Government and the State for purposes of this section.

"(h) A State may not be required by a law or regulation of the United States to deposit funds received by it in a separate bank account. However, a State shall account for funds made available to the State as United States Government funds in the accounts of the State. The head of the State agency concerned shall make periodic authenticated reports to the head of the appropriate Federal executive agency on the status and the application of the funds, the liabilities and obligations on hand, and other information required by the head of the executive agency. Records related to the funds received by the State shall be made available to the head of the executive agency and the Comptroller General for auditing in accordance with chapter 75 of this title.

"(i) The Secretary shall prescribe methods for the payment of interest, on an annual basis, between the Federal Government and the States, including provisions for offsetting amounts owed by the respective parties. Such methods of payment shall provide for comparable treatment in manner, technique, and timing for both the States and the Federal Government.

"(j) The Inspector General of an executive agency, or an officer of an executive agency performing functions similar to an Inspector General, in the case of an agency in which an Inspector General has not been established by law, shall periodically conduct audits of the implementation of this section. Periodic audits of the implementation of this section shall also be conducted by the States within the scope of work performed under chapter 75 of this title.

"(k) Consistent with Federal program purposes and regulations of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, the head of a Federal executive agency carrying out a program shall execute grant awards on a timely basis to assure the availability of funds to accomplish transfers in compliance with subsection (a) of this section.

"(1) In determining the amount to be paid by a State to the Federal Govenment under subsection (c) of this section, or to a State by the Federal Government under subsection (d) of this section, the Secretary shall consider costs incurred by the State in determining the amount due.".

(2) The item relating to section 6503 in the chapter analysis for chapter 65 of title 31, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"6503. Intergovernmental financing.".

(c)(1) Subject to paragraph (2) of this subsection, the provisions of this section and the amendments made by this section shall apply to all Federal programs and shall supersede the provisions of any Federal law or regulation in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act.

(2) The amendments made under paragraph (1) of this subsection shall apply only to programs and fund transfers involving those executive agencies that are subject to regulation by the Secretary of the Treasury under section 3720B of title 31, United States Code.

(d) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this Act, except that the provisions of section 6503 of title 31, United States Code (as added by subsection (b) of this section) which relate to the payment and receipt of interest by the Federal Government and State governments shall take effect two years after the date of the enactment of this Act.

HUMAN RIGHTS IN YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 169.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 169) supporting the efforts of Dobroslav Paraga to bring about increased respect for human rights in Yugoslavia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I am pleased to join Senator DIXON, Senator HELMS, Senator LEVIN, Senator SIMON, and Senator KENNEDY in introducing this important resolution on behalf of the Yugoslav/Croatian human rights activist, Dobroslav Paraga and urging respect for human rights in Yugoslavia.

Mr. Paraga, 28 years old, has spent the past decade advocating human rights in his country. His concern over the dismal state of human rights in Yugoslavia has prompted him, at great personal risk to himself and his family, to come to the West to expose those abuses by the Yugoslav Government, despite a 1987 Yugoslav court sentence which forbids him from speaking, appearing in public or writing about the conditions in Yugoslavia for 5 years.

During his visit to the United States, Canada, and West Germany, Mr. Paraga has met with government officials as well as with religious and human rights organizations. Twice adopted by Amnesty International as a prisoner of conscience in recognition of the suffering he has endured at the hands of the state for his political activism, Mr. Paraga's credibility and courage are beyond repute.

Mr. Paraga speaks not only of his own plight, but of that of Yugoslavia's 2,500 political prisoners, many of whom are being held in psychiatric hospitals. According to Mr. Paraga, Yugoslavia has the largest number of political prisoners of any other Eastern European country. In May 1989, the American Psychiatric Association gave its support to the Anatolij Koriagin Committee, founded by Paraga to fight against the use of psychiatric and psychological terror for political ends.

The Yugoslav Government's persecution of its citizens extends to the issuance of passports. Mr. Paraga maintains that more than 10,000 Yugoslav citizens have been denied passports because of political reasons.

Dobroslav Paraga's political activism has resulted in his being tried three times by Yugoslav courts. Initially charged when he was a 19-year-old student, along with his friend Ernest Brajder, for gathering signatures on a petition seeking amnesty for political prisoners. That Zagreb petition was directed to the Yugoslav Parliament and the followup meeting to the Helsinki Conference in Madrid.

For that action, both men were tried and convicted, and given 4-year jail terms. Brajder died 3 days after being arrested under what our State Department calls mysterious circumstances. Mr. Paraga believes Brajder died from the brutality he suffered at the hands of Yugoslav prison authorities, and has spent the past 9 years trying to determine the truth about his friend's death.

Mr. Paraga did survive his 4-year sentence, 2 years of which were spent in the concentration camp on Naked Island. A description of the torture inflicted on him during his imprisonment was recounted in a July 12, 1989, article appearing in the West German Newspaper Die Welt:

[During his imprisonment, Paraga was] handcuffed and tied to a chair; his leg was broken; at one time he was locked in a cage—nothing more than a hole in the ground—for 10 days, without clothes, during the icy cold weather. Daily he had to strip naked. With the aid of a rubber tube, they poured some liquid into his stomach, nearly choking him * * *"

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the full text of the Die Welt article be printed in the RECORD at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, through his brave disclosure of evidence about the Yugoslav Government's human rights abuses, Dobroslav Paraga has brought a clearer understanding of the situation in Yugoslavia. We, who enjoy the freedoms sought by the citizens of Yugoslavia, must take his testimony seriously, and urge the Yugoslav Government to honor its commitments under the Helsinki Accords and end the persecution of its citizens. Finally, our Government must do all it can to ensure that the Yugoslav Government not take action against Mr. Paraga for exercising his rights recognized under international law.

I am pleased that the ranking minority member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, Representative BROOMFIELD, along with Representative YATRON and Representative BEREUTER, the chairman and ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations in the House have written to Secretary of State Baker urging him to encourage the Yugoslav Government to respect the human rights of its citizens, not to take action against Mr. Paraga and urging that the United States Embassy in Belgrade monitor the regime's treatment of Mr. Paraga once he returns home. I ask unanimous consent that the full text of that letter be printed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the resolution now before the Senate is an important demonstration of this body's concern for the welfare not only of Mr. Paraga, who has suffered needlessly at the hands of the regime, and risks imprisonment again upon his return to Yugoslavia, but for the thousands of other Yugoslav citizens who are being denied their basic rights. As Mr. Paraga states in his testimony:

The United States generously assists Yugoslavia. Surely the American people deserve to spend their monies in countries where human rights are respected and international rules of conduct are implemented.

Mr. President, I believe Mr. Paraga is right. I urge my colleagues to join in unanimously adopting this important measure to make it clear that the Senate stands with Mr. Paraga in urging respect for the human rights of all the citizens of Yugoslavia.

CROATIAN FIGHTER FOR HUMAN RIGHTS ACCUSED THE STATE

(By Marta Weidenhiller)

He accused the Yugoslav state of human rights' abuses, and he seeks the freedom of all political prisoners in his homeland. This public declaration may, upon his return home, cause him to be jailed again: Dobroslav Paraga (28) Yugoslav, Croat, human rights activist.

"That I am able to be in Bonn, that one of my basic human rights was restored to me, that I received a passport, for this I am grateful to Richard von Weizsacker," he said in a conversation with Die Welt. He appealed to the President of the Federal Republic of Germany, who received him in Bonn, to intercede in securing amnesty for all political prisoners in his homeland, in seeking adherence to the Helsinki Accords agreed to by Yugoslavia, and in seeking equality for all citizens of a multi-national state.

Von Weizsacker had invited Paraga already in December of 1988 on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the proclamation of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Because he was denied a passport, Paraga staged a 17 day hunger strike. Von Weizsacker intervened with the Yugoslav government; the Croatian Cardinal Kuharic openly condemned the incident. Finally, the government gave him a passport, which now had enabled him to travel to the U.S., Canada, and the Federal Republic of Germany.

What do you hope for from the West? "The public must know how things stand in Yugoslavia," responded Paraga, who, even after years of prison and brutality, continues bravely to strive for respect of human rights. He established two committees (the Misuse of Psychiatry and the Croatian Committee for Human Rights). He cites an example that intervention and pressure from foreign countries will not go unheeded. He claims that in Yugoslavia there are some 2,500 politicial prisoners, in fact, the largest number of any Eastern European country; some 1,000 are rounded up every year. More than 10,000 Yugoslav citizens are unable to get passports because of political reasons.

Paraga's anguish began when he was 19 years old. Along with his friend, Ernest Brajder, he gathered signatures for a petition seeking amnesty for political prisoners. That "Zagreb Petition" was directed to the Yugoslav Parliament and the follow-up meeting to the Helsinki Conference in Madrid.

Both were tried and convicted, given 4 year jail terms. Brajder died because of the brutality he suffered. Paraga survived those 4 years, (two years) in the concentration camp on Naked island. This young man, who appears serious, too serious for his age, remains calm and speaks softly even when he recollects the humiliating treatment he received. He was handcuffed and tied to a chair; his leg was broken; at one time he was locked in a "cage" (nothing more than a hole in the ground) for 10 days, without clothes, during the icy cold weather. Daily he had to strip naked. With the aid of a rubber tube, they poured some liquid into his stomach, nearly chocking him. But not even that caused him to lose courage.

In jail he wrote a book about the abuses of human rights, about his very own suffering.

When, after his release from jail, it was established that his health was permanently damaged as a result of his imprisonment and the brutality he endured, he dared—as the first Yugoslav citizen ever—to file a suit against the state, accusing it of violating human rights and maltreatment. Once again, he was sentenced, a suspended sentence, which also declared a prohibition against speaking openly until 1991.

This Croat is banished from Croatia; thus he lives today, as he himself says, "in exile, in more liberal Slovenia." The "good will" of the government there will be seen if, after his return, he remains "free", that freedom confined by constant surveillance. Paraga, who, meanwhile, resumed his study of law, is not able to obtain permanent employment because he lacks approval of his "moral-political character." When the Social-Democratic Union of Slovenia was established in Ljubljana a few months ago, Paraga was among the founders.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1989.

Hon. JAMES A. BAKER III,
Secretary of State, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: We are writing to you on behalf of Mr. Dobroslav Paraga. Mr. Paraga is a Croatian dissident and a human rights activist. He served 4 years as a prisoner of conscience in Yugoslavia. Enclosed is some additional information on this important case.

After he received his passport, Mr. Paraga travelled to several Western countries and discussed continuing human rights violations in Yugoslavia. He provided specific information to Members of Congress, and staff, regarding the overall situation in Yugoslavia, but particularly the oppression which surrounded events in Kosovo earlier this year.

Mr. Paraga fears he will be subject to persecution upon his return to Yugoslavia. We, therefore, are appealing to you, to communicate to the Foreign Minister and appropriate authorities in Yugoslavia, to respect their international commitments under the Helsinki Final Act, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and other International Covenants, and not take action against Mr. Paraga for exercising his rights recognized under international law. We also hope that you will inform our Embassy in Belgrade of Mr. Paraga's situation so the U.S. government can monitor developments in this case.

We deeply appreciate your cooperation in this matter and look forward to hearing from you.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD,
Ranking Minority Member, Foreign Affairs Committee;
DOUG BEREUTER,
Ranking Minority Member,
GUS YATRON,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 169) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas Dobroslav Paraga, who has twice been adopted as a prisoner of conscience by Amnesty International, has endured hardship for openly calling on the Yugoslav government to honor its commitments under the Helsinki Accords to respect the fundamental human rights of all the citizens of Yugoslavia;

Whereas Dobroslav Paraga has been tried on three occasions by Yugoslav courts, the initial charge being that, in 1980, he, along with a Jewish Croatian student, Ernest Brajder, authored a petition opposing torture in Yugoslavia and calling for the release of political prisoners;

Whereas, as a result, both men were arrested and, three days later, Ernest Brajder died under what the Department of State calls "mysterious circumstances";

Whereas, in 1986, Mr. Paraga sued the government of Yugoslavia for injuries, both physical and psychological, inflicted on him by prison authorities during his imprisonment;

Whereas the regime and court in Zagreb denied him a fair and just trial, an account of which was set forth in the Department of State's annual Country Report on Human Rights Practices for 1987;

Whereas the Yugoslav Government forbade Mr. Paraga in 1987 to speak out publicly in any way about his experiences as a political prisoner;

Whereas, in violation of that order of silence, Dobroslav Paraga has come to the West to speak out about human rights abuses in Yugoslavia;

Whereas, upon his return to Yugoslavia, Dobroslav Paraga risks imprisonment again because of his open criticism of the Yugoslav Government's human rights abuses;

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the Government of Yugoslavia, in recognition of the provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, should guarantee its citizens fundamental human rights and freedoms;

(2) the Yugoslav Government should grant unconditional amnesty to all political prisoners;

(3) the Government of Yugoslavia should dismiss the charges currently pending against human rights activist Dobroslav Paraga, allow him and his family to return to their home in Croatia, and end all forms of harassment against him and his family; and

(4) the Government of Yugoslavia should conduct an investigation into the death of Ernest Brajder, who, according to the Department of State, died under "mysterious circumstances", and should make its findings public.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SUPPORT OF BASIC HUMAN RIGHTS AND DEMOCRACY IN BURMA

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution 61.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 61) in support of basic human rights and democracy in Burma.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

THE HOUSE ARREST OF AUNG SAN SUU KYI AND U TIN OO

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, it was just a year ago, almost to the day, that I rose in this Chamber to introduce a resolution, the first in fact, condemning the massive repression of prodemocracy demonstrations in Burma.

Things have only worsened in Burma. The despotic regime of Gen. Saw Maung has placed under house arrest prodemocracy leaders of the National League for Democracy Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo. Telephone lines to their homes have reportedly been disconnected. Representatives from the British Embassy are said to have been denied access to Aung San Suu Kyi and her British husband. Indeed, we have received word that Aung San Suu Kyi has begun a hunger strike protesting her illegal arrest.

These actions by the Burmese regime are a slap in the face to an international community outraged by such repressive actions.

The history here is clear and I have often repeated it. We are not surprised by such actions—they are the methods imposed by weak, little dictators who first came to power in Burma in a military coup in 1962. We mustn't allow ourselves to forget this history.

Last summer, prodemocracy demonstrators marched in the streets of Rangoon and other cities around the country in defiance of the regime and its imposition of martial law. Thousands marched and thousands died. The Government turned its guns on these, mostly students, shooting them down indiscriminately. Even on the steps of our Embassy, women fell from gunshots fired upon them by troops of this brutal regime.

Aung San Suu Kyi is the legitimate opposition in Burma. Her arrest douses any hopes for free and fair elections promised the Burmese people by the Government, for May of 1990.

We are appalled by such actions and will not turn our backs on the efforts of the people, including the country's many ethnic minorities, to establish a democratically elected government in Burma. We will not stand by quietly while the Burmese Government's thugs harass the democratic opposition in that country.

This resolution, also introduced in the House of Representatives, sends a clear message to Gen. Saw Maung and the Burmese regime that we in Congress and in the United States do not lightly tolerate such actions and will not ignore these outrageous affronts to international law and human rights.

Today, 19 Members of the Congress will send a letter to Gen. Saw Maung expressing our outrage and deploring these actions.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that several articles by Steve Erlanger be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPPOSITION LEADER IS CONFINED BY BURMESE RULERS

(By Steven Erlanger)

BANGKOK, THAILAND, July 20.—The military Government of Myanmar, formerly Burma, put the country's most prominent opposition leader under house arrest today, diplomats said. International telephone and telex lines to the country were apparently cut.

News agencies reported that troops had surrounded the compound of the opposition leader, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi, in north-central Yangon, formerly Rangoon. The house also serves as a headquarters for her party, the National League for Democracy, which was formed in the demonstrations in support of democracy that were crushed by the military in September, when at least 3,000 unarmed Burmese were killed.

A Western diplomat in Bangkok confirmed the agency accounts and said that Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi was turned back when she tried to leave the house. U Tin Oo, the official leader of the party, was not allowed to enter the compound. At least one diplomat was also turned away. The streets near the compound were blocked off by troops, the reports said.

Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi, who returned to Burma to look after her dying mother, has become the leading symbol of democratic opposition to martial law and 27 years of military rule. Her father, U Aung San, is regarded as the father of the country. He was assassinated 42 years ago.

RULE BASED ON INTIMIDATION

Married to a Briton and educated mainly in the West, Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi has become an increasingly capable and sophisticated politician. The crowds who have gathered to hear her speak in defiance of martial law have ranged between 10,000 and 15,000 people, diplomats said, and have been growing larger. She has also become more outspoken in her criticism of the military Government and of U Ne Win, who seized power in a coup in 1962 and who is believed to remain in effective control of the country.

The Government's action came a day after Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi canceled a planned rally in defiance of martial law, as heavily armed troops patrolled the streets of Yangon. Wednesday was Martyr's Day, when the country commemorates the assassination of Mrs. Aung San Kyi's father and six members of the Cabinet, who brought Burma to the brink of independence.

Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi said Wednesday in interviews and a statement that the Government's rule "is based on intimidation," adding "They don't have any other way of running the country."

"My father died because there were people who preferred guns to solve political problems" she said, and she described the current military leaders as "fascists." She said she thought that the Government was looking for a pretext to ban her party before elections that are to occur before next May.

Telephone Links Severed

The diplomat said there were rumors in Yangon today that the military intended to deport Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi, who holds Burmese citizenship but who has lived much of her life abroad.

Despite her call for the Burmese to stay at home on Wednesday, soldiers broke up scattered groups of demonstrators and arrested at least 44 people. On Monday, soldiers arrested three youths who are associated with the National League for Democracy and charged them with a bombing the previous week. Western diplomats in Yangon regarded the bombing as suspicious and perhaps a provocation by the Government.

MYANMAR ARRESTS TROUBLE UNITED STATES

WASHINGTON, July 20.—The State Department said today that arrests of opposition members in Myanmar "cast serious doubts" on the Government's stated intention to hold free elections next year.

"The United States Government is deeply disturbed by this series of actions taken against Burma's largest political party, which casts serious doubts on the Burmese Government's repeated promises to hold free and fair elections by May of 1990," the statement said.

It urged authorities to allow "freedom of movement and expression and to release other political prisoners." "We also hope the Burmese Government will permit the political activity essential for the holding of democratic elections," it said.

[From the New York Times, July 22, 1989]

TWO BURMESE OPPOSITION LEADERS FACE HOUSE ARREST FOR UP TO YEAR

(By Steven Erlanger)

BANGKOK, THAILAND, July 21.—The military Government of Myanmar, formerly Burma, announced today that the country's two most prominent opposition politicians had been put under heavily guarded house arrest for up to a year under a law protecting the state from "destructive elements."

In addition to the two party leaders, Daw Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo, other prominent figures in the National League for Democracy have been arrested, said Asian and Western diplomats in touch with their embassies in Yangon, formerly Rangoon. International telephone lines to Myanmar are still cut, operators said.

Diplomats reported on Thursday that Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi was under house arrest, but it was not clear until today that the Government intended to confine her for an extended period.

"They're trying to shut down her party," an Asian diplomat said today. The party is by far the largest force in opposition to the martial-law regime led by Gen. Saw Maung, who took control Sept. 18 while crushing pro-democracy demonstrations. Last August and September, at least 3,000 unarmed Burmese demonstrators were shot down by troops.

ANTI-MILITARY ACTION CHARGED

A spokesman for the Burmese military Government, U Kyaw Sann, said in Yangon that Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi and Mr. Tin Oo had been charged with sowing dissension in the military and nurturing hatred for the armed forces among the populace, activities that are illegal under a 1975 law to protect the state from "destructive elements." The military has run the country since a 1962 coup led by Gen. Ne Win, who is still considered to be in effective control of the country.

Mr. Kyaw Sann said that Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi and Mr. Tin Oo had been rendered incommunicado with the outside world and that their telephones had been disconnected. Only immediate family members will be allowed to leave their home compounds, and only under guard.

The spokesman said Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi had tried "to demoralize the soldiers so they would lose the heart for fighting" and had "accused the military of being fascists with the intention of making people hate the military."

He said Mr. Tin Oo, a former high-ranking army general, had falsely accused the military of inhuman acts and had stated that elections promised for May of next year would not be free or fair.

NO BAN ON PARTY NOW

He said that the National League for Democracy would be allowed to continue functioning as a political party, but that the Government would "reconsider" if they "continue with their confrontations." He said other members of the party were being interrogated.

A State Department official in Washington, interviewed by telephone, said the arrests "are certainly a grave development." He said the United States still hoped for free and fair elections in Burma, "and we are not entirely discounting that, even with them under house arrest."

On Wednesday, known as Martyrs' Day to commemorate the 1947 assassination of Mrs. Aung San Suu Kyi's father, U Aung San, and six of his Cabinet colleagues, the opposition leader called off planned rallies in defiance of martial law. The Government said it arrested 44 "troublemakers" on Wednesday for violating martial law regulations that ban the gathering of five or more people.

Earlier this week, the Government arrested three members of the youth wing of the party on charges of planting a bomb that blew up two weeks ago at the country's main oil refinery in Syriam, nine miles outside Yangon. A diplomat said today that the Government was using the bomb "as the justification for the moves" against the opposition party.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution be agreed to, and that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The preamble was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 61), with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas the people of Burma are currently ruled by an unelected military government that does not govern by the consent of the people;

Whereas Burmese citizens from all social classes and ethnic backgrounds are striving to replace military rule with a democratic government;

Whereas hundreds of thousands of Burmese citizens demonstrated peacefully for democratic change in August and September 1988;

Whereas the Burmese Government violently suppressed these peaceful demonstrations, killing thousands of unarmed civilians and forcing others to flee for their lives;

Whereas the Government of Burma has pledged to hold free and fair elections in Burma by May 1990;

Whereas despite this commitment, the Burmese military has heightened restrictions on Burma's political opposition, imprisoning hundreds of political activists and placing National League of Democracy leaders Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo under house arrest;

Whereas the Government of Burma has also continued to obstruct peaceful opposition protests and has continued to use deadly force against demonstrators;

Whereas the procedural rights of persons charged with political offenses have been severely curtailed through martial law orders bestowing judicial authority on military commanders and empowering them to conduct summary trials that lack basic safeguards; and

Whereas independent human rights monitors report patterns of severe beatings of opposition activists during interrogations, in some cases leading to death: Now, therefore, be it.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Congress—

(1) calls upon the Government of Burma to—

(A) remove house arrest orders imposed on Aung San Suu Kyi and U Tin Oo;

(B) release all persons imprisoned for the peaceful expression of their views;

(C) abandon martial law restrictions on the right to a fair trial and provide all persons charged with crimes with access to lawyers and family members, adequate time to prepare defenses, and the opportunity to have cases heard by an impartial tribunal;

(D) order thorough investigations of reports of torture and pursue prosecutions against those believed to be responsible for mistreatment of detainees;

(E) permit opposition political parties to operate freely in Burma and, in particular, to exercise their rights of free association, expression, and assembly without fear of arrest, imprisonment, or prosecution; and

(f) maintain its commitment to hold free and fair elections in Burma by May 1990;

(2) calls upon all nations to withhold foreign assistance from the Government of Burma until a democratically elected government assumes office; and

(3) calls upon the President, the Secretary of State, the United States Permanent Representative to the United Nations, and the United States Ambassador to Burma to—

(A) condemn publicly the heightened level of repression in Burma; and

(B) encourage free and fair elections by May 1990 and the provision of international observers for such elections.

ORDER OF PROCEDURE

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I am going to yield the floor shortly. Later I will introduce a cloture motion on the appropriations bill. I need a few more signatures. I realize that the Senator from North Carolina can draw his amendment in such a way as to make it germane under cloture. But at any rate, that will have some effect to speed up the consideration of the bill.

I think there is some advantage in having cloture on the bill. As I say, we may have to try to get cloture on other appropriations bills as they move along if we hope to get these bills enacted and on the President's desk.

DUE PROCESS OF LAW AND OLIVER NORTH

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I oppose, before I yield the floor, the proposal, let me say again, by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina. It is a proposal that in effect circumvents the due process of the law in the case of Oliver North. The Navy decided that a convicted felon like Mr. North should not enjoy the benefits of his military pension. And the General Accounting Office, which is an arm of the Congress, upheld that decision. Now Mr. North is appealing the decision. He has a right to such an appeal under our system of justice—which he has held in contempt.

I am opposed to giving Mr. North his pension, because I think that his actions damaged our country, damaged the credibility of our Nation. He thumbed his nose at the Constitution that he was honor bound to uphold, he violated his oath of office. He violated the laws of the land. And he did so knowingly, and repeatedly, and he has been busy on the stump explaining to the American people, for a hefty fee, why this is a great American thing to do. He did not like the laws, so he ignored them and violated them.

I am also opposed to giving Mr. North his pension because it would circumvent the due process of justice in our country. If a court reinstates his pension, then he has won his case, and I will abide by the result. We will all abide by the result because we, unlike Colonel North and some of his superiors, respect the law and respect our system of due process.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent now that I may yield to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts whom I have kept waiting for a considerable length of time. I thank him for his patience.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. KERRY. I thank the distinguished President pro tempore.

Mr. MACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KERRY. The Senator will yield for a question.

Mr. MACK. I asked the Senator to yield.

Mr. KERRY. I know the Senator from Massachusetts has a brief statement on Pan Am 103.

Mr. President, I hold the floor at the pleasure of the distinguished President pro tempore. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to yield to the Senator from Florida without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. With that understanding, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, I thank you.

I am delighted to share in the comments of the Senator from Florida, and the distinguished majority leader.

I serve as chairman of the Narcotics, Terrorism Subcommittee and one of the hearings referred to in the creation of the Commission were the hearings that we had on Pan Am 103.

I also call to mind regrettably the fact that Massachusetts shared in the grief and sorrow of that tragedy with families who lost loved ones. And I have met personally with those families in Massachusetts, as well as here in the hearings, as well as with families from New Jersey and elsewhere.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. LAUTENBERG] has worked diligently and hard to pursue interest that he was sensitive to from the beginning. I think all of us are grateful to the President who has seen fit to create this Commission. It is an important effort. Hopefully, it can help to shed light in a way that will prevent such a tragedy from occurring again at some point in the future.

So I congratulate the President for this move. It is an important beginning, and I hope the Commission will be successful in not only finding out how we can deal with these things ourselves internally in the State Department and elsewhere, but what, in fact, we may be able to do from a security perspective and other perspectives to avoid it.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not intend to hold the floor very long, but I am now under obligation to protect the Treasury, Postal Service appropriation bill for the time being. If Senators want me to yield to them, I will be happy to, without losing my right to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the President pro tempore hold the floor?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, does the Senator wish me to yield to him?

Mr. LOTT. I would be glad to withhold.

I understand the Senator has some business he needs to transact and then I would appreciate it if the President pro tempore would yield to me.

Mr. BYRD. Very well.

FEDERAL MARITIME COMMISSION AUTHORIZATION ACT

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the acting Republican leader, Mr. COCHRAN, is on the floor.

Mr. President, on behalf of the majority leader, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of Calendar Order No. 147, H.R. 840, the Federal Maritime Commission authorization bill.

So the bill (H.R. 840), as amended, was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill as amended, was passed.

Mr. COCHRAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

TREASURY, POST OFFICE, EXECUTIVE OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT, AND INDEPENDENT AGENCIES APPROPRIATIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1990

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I will be happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] with the understanding that I yield only for a statement at this point.

I yield only for a statement and then I ask to retain to my rights to the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the junior Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BYRD. May I ask how long would the Senator wish to speak?

Mr. LOTT. Just 3 minutes will be adequate.

Mr. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. President, I would like to express my appreciation to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia for yielding me this time. I would like to make a few remarks on a matter now pending before the Senate, the Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government appropriation bill, and an amendment that has been offered as a second degree amendment by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. HELMS].

I do not feel that I can stand mute on this subject at this hour without expressing my concerns about what is happening in this case with regard to Col. Oliver North.

It has been curious to me watching the process today and earlier this year where there have been a lot of complaints about legislation on appropriations bills and nongermane language.

I have always felt that there should be strict limits on legislation on appropriations bills and nongermane language. But I have watched over the past 16 years as it happens over and over and over on almost every bill. It depends on whether or not you oppose what your interests may be, legislation on an appropriation bill or nongermane language depends upon, although I am sure there are various Members, particularly on the Appropriations Committee, who have consistently said we should not be doing that.

There is certainly nothing out of order about this, but I have also noticed a number of efforts this year to avoid direct votes or even indirect votes on what could certainly be termed very important issues, but which some Members would prefer that we not have a vote on.

Or, we quite often have committees come in and say, "Well, we have not had time to work on it." And I make particular reference to section 89 and to catastrophic health insurance, which we tried repeatedly this year to direct action on. The flag-burning issue is another one. And now we are finding it extremely difficult to get a direct vote or even an indirect vote, even via a motion to table, on the question of Col. Oliver North's pension.

I am not an expert on what the law allows or who is eligible for a pension and who is not. But I support the position that Colonel North earned this pension for his service in uniform to our country. I am very much opposed to a situation that would lead to the revocation of his pension.

If he made mistakes, and the court has said that he did, and if he is going to be punished for them, that is the way the law works. But to go back and retroactively take this pension away from this man, I think, is extremely unfair.

I have heard it mentioned earlier today on the floor, and maybe others will refer to it, that convicted drug traffickers are able to keep certain government benefits, including any retirement, welfare, Social Security, health, disability or veterans benefits. Yet we would take these benefits away from Colonel North.

I realize honest men and women can differ on this issue. But I feel very strongly about this and I know that many people, including most of the people in my own State of Mississippi, would argue that he is entitled to this pension. I support that proposition.

If we cannot act on this bill to restore Col. Oliver North's pension, we should do it soon on another bill, and by a direct vote. I would urge the Senate to allow us to have that opportunity.

Thank you.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may I say that I respect every other Senator's right to his own opinion. I would never quarrel with that. It is just that I would like to see this appropriations bill move along.

There are amendments from time to time in legislation on an appropriations bill that constitute legislation on the appropriation bill. I understand that.

As I said earlier, I understand every Senator's right to offer a very controversial amendment to the appropriations bill that constitutes legislation on an appropriations bill. I just urge the Senators not to follow this practice. We are making every attempt, working very hard to get the appropriations bills out and on the floor of the conference to meet the fiscal deadline.

COMMITTEE REPORT ON ETBE

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, the report accompanying H.R. 2989 contains language instructing Treasury to rule by October 15, 1989, on whether a new chemical called "ETBE" [ethyl tertiary butyl ether] is eligible for the alcohol fuels tax credit under section 40 of the Internal Revenue Code.

Mr. President, the report language may seem innocuous. What could be wrong with telling Treasury to issue a ruling in response to a request that has been pending for a year? Aren't taxpayers entitled to an answer?

The problem, Mr. President, is that the history of this issue is already so highly politicized that I fear that Treasury may interpret the report language as additional pressure from Congress to rule in favor of a tax credit for ETBE. The report language itself leaves no doubt that its authors indeed intend it to pressure Treasury. The report notes that 75 Senators, along with assorted administration officials, have lobbied Treasury to declare ETBE eligible for the alcohol fuels credit. It further notes that 61 of these Senators were members when the original credit passed and that it was their intent to make products like ETBE eligible. Then it says: Rule on eligibility by October 15, 1989.

Mr. President, Treasury should certainly respond to taxpayer requests in a timely fashion. But Treasury should also take the time needed to judge issues on the merits. They should not be pressured by the Hill to act prematurely. Particularly when the action urged would cost the vast majority of American taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars in order to provide generous tax cuts for a relative few.

Mr. President, the report language most definitely does not reflect this Senator's view either of the legislative intent underlying IRC section 40 or the tax policy of the U.S. Government. And this Senator was a member of the Senate Energy Committee and the Senate Finance Committee and a conferee when we adopted the alcohol fuels credit in 1980. I would therefore urge Treasury to regard this language as hortatory only and to decide the issue strictly on the merits in accordance with whatever timetable and whatever sound tax policy is appropriate to the exercise of sound, unbiased judgment.

So that everyone understands what's at stake here, let's be clear about what the issues are and why there's genuine controversy. There are two issues: First, whether the Federal Government should increase the deficit by subsidizing the production of a commercially untested and unproven gasoline additive called ETBE. Second, whether any such decision should be preempted by the Treasury instead of, as I believe, being made by the Congress in the normal, deliberative legislative process.

I understand that the revenue loss from subsidizing ETBE could be as high as half a billion dollars over the next 5 years. Ethanol industry figures suggest that the revenue loss could be considerably higher than that. Moreover, the Department of Agriculture estimates that these losses will not ultimately be offset by corresponding savings from reduced farm program subsidies.

Before any additional tax expenditures are given to the ethanol industry, 60 percent of which is dominated by a single company, a thorough review is necessary by the relevant congressional committees and the Congress. Included in this review should be whether subsidizing an uneconomic product such as ETBE would or would not enhance our energy and environmental security and whether and how such a subsidy would affect unsubsidized products that are now serving the same function.

In view of the priority that we are giving to reducing the deficit and avoiding new tax expenditures—and of the difficult task we already face in meeting current budget targets—it makes no sense to create a costly new tax subsidy, particularly without an explicit legislative mandate. I understand that a number of Senators have already reconsidered earlier expressions of preliminary support for ETBE, based on more recent information about its cost and potential adverse effects on U.S. environmental and energy policy goals and on the development of unsubsidized clean burning alternative fuels by domestic producers.

So, Mr. President, let the record show that there are two sides to this issue—which is presumably why Treasury has so far rightly refused to rush to judgment. Ultimately, this is an issue for Congress to decide here on the floor, under the clear-eyed scrutiny of the American taxpayers who once again see the long arm of the Government reaching deeper and deeper into their pockets to benefit a handful of special interests.

COMMITTEE REPORT ON ETHYL TERTIARY BUTYL ETHER

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I would like to associate my name with Senator BRADLEY's statement regarding the report language accompanying H.R. 2989 which instructs the Treasury to rule by October 15, 1989, on whether a new chemical called ETBE [ethyl tertiary butyl ether] is eligible for the alcohol fuels tax credit under section 40 of the Internal Revenue Code.

I agree with Senator BRADLEY that this matter should be left for Congress to decide. I feel strongly that alternative fuels should be given equal treatment under the Tax Code. I think that any attempt to expand the tax subsidy administratively would raise important energy, economic, competitive, environmental and tax policy issues that should be addressed by the Congress. When the current ethanol tax subsidies expire in 1992 the benefits and scope of the existing credit should be debated openly in Congress and all alternative fuel sources should be given similar consideration.

Mr. LAUTENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to express my concern about language that was included in the committee report on this bill with respect to ethyl tertiary butyl ether, known as ETBE.

This report language, Mr. President, calls on the Treasury Department to make a determination about whether ETBE is eligible for the alcohol fuels tax credit under section 40 of the Internal Revenue Code. The report specifically directs the Treasury to issue a ruling not later than October 15, 1989.

Mr. President, I am concerned that this report language will be interpreted as an attempt to exert pressure on the Treasury to declare ETBE eligible for the tax credit. My concern is based on language noting that many Senators, and some in the administration, have written to the Treasury in support of allowing ETBE to qualify for the credit. While highlighting the pressure that has been exerted from certain political leaders, the report fails to indicate the many concerns that have been expressed by others who oppose such a ruling.

It is not clear, for example, that Congress ever intended the alcohol fuels tax credit to apply to additives such as ETBE. In fact, ETBE did not even exist when the credit was enacted.

Many have also questioned the wisdom of subsidizing ETBE when other methanol-based additives are unsubsidized. Clearly, care must be taken to avoid a situation in which the Tax Code creates unfair competition between manufacturers of similarly functioning products.

In addition, serious questions have been raised about the impact of subsidizing ETBE on the Federal budget deficit. It has been suggested that up to $500 million could be added to the national debt if ETBE is found eligible for the credit. That is a lot of money, particularly at a time when the deficit is preventing adequate investment in vital national priorities, from environmental protection to housing to transportation.

Given these concerns, I would hope that the Treasury Department will consider this issue carefully, and base its determination on existing law, not political pressure. If the alcohol fuel tax credit was not intended to cover products like ETBE, it is up to Congress to determine whether such a subsidy is warranted. Not unelected administrators.

Mr. President, my message to the Treasury is simple. Don't be rushed to judgment. Don't respond to political pressure. Just take the time you need and do the right thing.

REPORT LANGUAGE

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, I would like to acknowledge Senator DECONCINI, chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Treasury, Postal Service, and General Government for proceeding with fiscal year 1990 Treasury, Postal Appropriations Act so expeditiously and congratulate him for setting such a fine example of hard work and devotion to his job. I want to thank him for his help in funding Maryland projects. I would also like to thank his fine staff, Patty Lynch and Ursula Maurer. Their hard work, courtesy, and candor, with me and my staff, were instrumental in accomplishing this difficult task. Furthermore, I recognize the ranking minority member Senator DOMENICI as well as his staff, Becky Davies and Judee Klepec for their help throughout the process. The subcommittee staff's indepth knowledge of the subject matter and long hours were instrumental in getting this important bill prepared in such a timely and efficient manner.

I would like to briefly mention a few of the important items contained in this bill.

This bill contains increased funding for programs designed to combat the drug problem. As we all know the drug problem in this country is, indeed, widespread. Customs, Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and IRS all play an important role in stopping the spread of this terrible problem. These funds are necessary in order to continue the fight in the war on drugs. There are two additional items which will be used in this war: Full funding of the $20 million authorized for the Customs forfeiture fund which will help the State and local governments that cooperate in drug investigations with Federal agencies, also there is $4.7 million for a Federal courthouse in the Southern District of the District Court of Maryland where many of the drug cases involving the Washington area will be tried, and send the criminals who perpetrate these crimes behind bars.

Another item of importance to the people of the State of Maryland is that the State of Maryland be included within the National Capital region as GSA plans to relocate the IRS and the Department of the Navy. I believe that the Federal Government should aggressively pursue the relocation and consolidation of Federal agencies to high-quality, low-cost space in the National Capital region. It is essential that Maryland be equally considered in the relocation plans.

In accord with the budget agreement, the House bill includes language giving Federal employees a 3.6-percent salary raise. I feel that the Federal workers who work day in and day out under difficult conditions should be provided with the resources they need to serve the American people. I believe that although this does not solve the problem of the 26-percent pay differential Federal employees suffer compared with the private sector, the 3.6-percent increase is a step in the right direction.

I also ask that three cost neutral provisions be included in this bill in order to improve the working conditions for the men and women who run the Government on a day-to-day basis. The first provision of this bill language would increase the mobility within the Government of the Senior Executive Service [SES] and their equivalent as originally intended by Congress. The second provision would give an agency the flexibility to pay a small relocation bonus to SES candidates in situations where the agency needs to compensate them for moving to a high area or undesirable location. The last provision explicitly states the intention of a previously enacted requirement regarding the number of career appointments to agency performance review boards.

In addition, I also request funds in the amount of $98 million for the lease/purchase consolidation of the Health Care Financing Administration campus. This level of funding would equal the amount provided in the House-passed bill. This consolidation would make possible a new, more efficient office environment. Their current facilities are not conducive for the efficient flow of information through the various divisions within the Health Care Financing Administration.

I request that report language be included to provide for a post office facility in Prince Georges County, MD. It is a high priority of mine to ensure the Federal employees who live and work in and around the Washington area work under the best possible conditions. This provision would keep the lease procedure for Federal property intact.

Another area of vital concern to me is child care facilities. The availability of child care facilities increases worker productivity and improves general worker morale. Because more parents are working today, child care is a national concern. Language is included in the report accompanying the bill which directs the Postal Service to study the feasibility and need for child care services in the larger facilities of the Postal Service.

Once again Mr. President, I would like to acknowledge the job Senator DECONCINI and his staff have done. They must handle many requests for funds and choose from the many deserving projects. Their efforts are truly commendable.

Mr. GLENN. If the distinguished Senator from Arizona will yield, I would like to enter into a colloquy with him to clarify the intent of Congress in adopting section 619 of this appropriations bill with respect to requiring the Federal Government's mandatory use of FTS-2000 telecommunications services.

Mr. DECONCINI. I would be pleased to yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLENN. I thank the chairman. Some years ago, the General Services Administration embarked on an effort to consolidate the Federal Government's procurement of basic long-distance telecommunications services. Under the rubric of FTS-2000, the GSA attempted to achieve economies of scale and to ensure that all long-distance telecommunications service within the executive branch was compatible.

An initial area of controversy, resolved during the 100th Congress, was the issue of which Federal agencies would be required to participate in the FTS-2000 procurement. Exercising its proper and appropriate policymaking role, Congress has directed that the procurement would be mandatory for all agencies subject to the Brooks Act. We reiterate that direction in this bill. It is only logical that the Government will achieve its goals more readily with the broadest possible participation by the Federal agencies involved. At the same time, however, there are other services needed in those agencies that are not within the scope of the FTS-2000 contract. In fact, there has been some confusion and concern in the vendor community as to exactly where the line of demarcation lies between FTS-2000 services and those not mandated by the Congress concerning mandatory use.

In that regard, Mr. Chairman, let me emphasize that I firmly believe that it is not the role of Congress to be a contract administrator or to be in the position of interpreting clauses or provisions of the request for proposals issued by GSA or the final FTS-2000 contract document itself. There are clearly established regulatory and judicial avenues to provide relief for disputes over contract interpretation, including any question as to which services FTS-2000 covers. Vendors who disagree with GSA's decisions should utilize those avenues.

Mr. DECONCINI. I thank the Senator for his comments and would like to affiliate myself with them. As subcommittee chairman, I emphasize our continuing commitment to mandatory use of FTS-2000 and join with the Senator in urging GSA to require agencies to live up to the law concerning mandatory use, and to ensure that existing policies provide the full vendor community with notice of procurements of services not covered by the mandatory use requirements.

Mr. GLENN. I agree with the Senator, and I would like to take this opportunity to urge GSA to precisely define the scope of the FTS-2000 contracts in its rulemaking process currently underway. It is my understanding that the agency intends to issue a FIRMR bulletin as part of its interim final rule which would more fully define the scope of the contracts. I believe that such precise definition is necessary for the successful vendors under the FTS-2000 contract and the rest of the vendor community.

PRESERVING THE EDUCATIONAL LOAN TAX DEDUCTION

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I have decided not to offer my amendment, but I would like to discuss it because I will be pursuing it at a later time.

The amendment is a sense-of-the-Congress indicating the need for restoring the interest deduction on student loans.

I have spoken with the Finance Committee about this issue and have been ensured that the committee will work with me toward my goal of restoring the educational interest deduction.

As we all know, under the 1986 Tax Reform Act, the consumer interest deduction is to be phased out after the 1990 tax year. Unfortunately, interest on educational loans was lumped together with consumer interest, so the interest deduction on student loans will also be terminated after next year.

Well, Mr. President, I think this was a mistake. There's just no legitimate reason to equate interest on educational loans with consumer interest. The justification for repealing the general interest deduction was that it acted as a disincentive to saving. This may be true in regard to consumer debt, but this argument certainly doesn't apply to debt incurred for educational purposes. What better investment can be made than an investment in the education, and therefore the future, of America?

The effect of the current law actually runs counter to the policy of investing in one's own future by making it more difficult to better oneself through education. Is this really the policy we want to set, Mr. President? I don't think so, and I believe most of my colleagues, as well as the American people, would agree with me.

In addition, the current law discriminates against lower income taxpayers who are the people needing our help the most. Consumer interest, up to a limit, remains deductible if the loan is secured by a taxpayer's residence. Even if this home equity loan is used for educational purposes, the interest is deductible. We, therefore, have an unfortunate situation where people who can afford a home may also get a tax break for education, but those who cannot afford a home must also pay more for their education. This just doesn't make sense, and it's time to change this unfair situation.

Mr. President, we all agree that education is a national investment which will be a determining factor in the future of America. Restoring the interest deduction for student loans would express the value we place on education and its role in maintaining the position of the United States as the leader of the free world.

I have introduced legislation in both the 100th and 101st Congresses to restore the interest deduction on student loans. In this Congress, S. 656 is cosponsored by 16 Senators and the House companion bill, H.R. 118, introduced by Congressman SCHULZE, has over 300 cosponsors.

I intend to propose this legislation later in the session on a more appropriate bill.

Mr. President, it's time to support the education and future of America by adjusting the Tax Code to allow a fair deduction to all Americans for reasonable educational expenses.

TREASURY AND POSTAL SERVICE APPROPRIATIONS BILL

Mr. BIDEN. Mr. President, I congratulate the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Subcommittee on Treasury and Postal Service Appropriations, Senators DECONCINI and DOMENICI, on their success in bringing to the floor a bill that provides near full funding for authorized antidrug programs.

The 1988 drug bill authorized spending $2.8 billion more in fiscal year 1989 to fight the drug plague. We also appropriated in that bill $1 billion of the authorized amount. I said then that it was one-half of a loaf, an unfulfilled promise that would have to be fulfilled 1 day. Unfortunately, that day has not come—the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988 remains almost two-thirds unfunded.

This year, many of my colleagues and I have been working to find a way to fully fund these critical programs.

The Moynihan amendment to the fiscal year 1990 budget resolution reinforced the need to maintain the integrity of the drug bill initiatives. It was adopted by voice vote.

The Biden amendment to the 1989 dire emergency supplemental appropriations bill would have fully funded last year's drug bill. Largely because of a veto threat, the Senate rejected the amendment. Ultimately, this dire emergency and urgent supplemental bill contained less than $100 million in new spending for antidrug efforts.

On July 17, 1989, I wrote to the chairman and ranking member of each Senate and the House Appropriations Subcommittee urging them to include in the fiscal year 1990 spending bills appropriations for all unfunded balances of the 1988 drug bill.

I am pleased that the Senate Treasury and Postal Subcommittee—the first subcommittee with jurisdiction over major unfunded portions of the 1988 drug bill to report a fiscal 1990 spending bill—has been able to find virtually all of the money necessary to pay for last year's drug bill.

Specifically, the Treasury and Postal Service appropriations bill provides the following amounts:

Customs Service: The bill provides $28.8 million more than was necessary to maintain the 1989 appropriations level for antidrug programs of $1.183 billion and the additional $79 million that was unfunded in last year's bill. In addition, the bill provides $151.7 million more for antidrug programs than the President requested.

Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms: The bill provides $12.6 million more than was necessary to maintain the 1989 appropriations level of $241 million and the additional $4 million called for—but not paid for—in the 1988 drug bill. In addition, the Senate bill provides $11.6 million more than the President requested in his 1990 budget request.

Federal Law Enforcement Training Center, Glynco, GA: The subcommittee's bill appropriates $57.1 million for salaries and construction for the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center.

Although the bill does not exactly meet the level needed to continue the 1989 funding level of $34.6 million and the additional $5.7 million called for in the 1988 drug bill, it does provide $13.1 million more than the President requested for the Federal training center.

Given the tight budget situation this year, I think the chairman of the subcommittee, Senator DECONCINI, and the ranking member, Senator DOMENICI, should be commended for making the tough decisions necessary to provide critically needed funds for this Nation's fight against drugs.

Our work however, is not complete. Hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of high-priority antidrug programs in last year's drug bill remain unfunded, including:

More than $250 million for the FBI, DEA, and other Federal law enforcement agencies;

The sum of $200 million for State and local law enforcement agencies—enough money to establish State and local drug enforcement task forces in hundreds of communities throughout this country;

Almost $1 billion for programs aimed at reducing the demand for drugs through education, prevention, treatment, and research efforts; and

The sum of $164 million for new Coast Guard cutters, helicopters, and drug enforcement personnel to interdict drugs enroute to the United States on the high seas.

I hope to work with the chairmen and ranking members of the several appropriations subcommittees with jurisdiction over antidrug programs to ensure that the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988—which Congress passed and the President signed with such fanfare—is fully funded.

In addition, I am concerned about funding for the Federal organized crime and drug enforcement task forces. These task forces were first created by President Reagan in 1983 in order to improve coordination between the numerous Federal law enforcement agencies engaged in the battle against high-level organized criminals and sophisticated drug trafficking operations.

The President's initial goal was sound—creating integrated task forces of specialized Federal agents whose sole allegiance was to the success of the task forces, not to their individual agencies. Predictably, the agencies balked, and the next year the central coordinating mechanism was all but abolished and each agency was free to set its own priorities and budget requests.

As a result, the task forces became a paper exercise—task force in name only, with each agency pursuing its own agenda.

After several years of fighting with the agencies to improve the operation of the task force—including a request to the General Accounting Office to examine the management of the task forces—I authored an amendment that was included in last year's Anti-Drug Abuse Act that addresses this problem by requiring the President to submit a separate appropriations request for expenses relating to all Federal agencies participating in the organized crime drug enforcement task forces.

As the statute explicitly states, the purpose of my amendment was to:

First, provide for the flexibility of the task forces which is vital to success—against drug traffickers and organized criminals;

Second, permit Federal law enforcement resources to be shifted in response to changing patterns of organized criminal drug activities;

Third, permit the Attorney General to reallocate resources among the organizational components of the task forces and between regions without undue delay; and

Fourth, ensure that the task forces function as a unit, without the competition for resources among the participating agencies that would undermine the overall effort.

The President's fiscal 1990 budget request complied with the new requirement by centralizing the budget request for the task forces—both Justice Department and nonjustice department agencies—in one line item in the Department of Justice budget.

Unfortunately, there has been some confusion in the appropriations process regarding funding for the task forces. This conflict must be resolved as quickly as possible. One of the major goals of last year's drug bill was to improve coordination of this Nation's antidrug efforts—that's one of the reasons we created the new national drug director post. That's also why we added the task force provision to last year's drug bill—to improve coordination and management of these essential antidrug units.

I look forward to working with the appropriate subcommittee chairmen to resolve this issue so that the organized crime and drug enforcement task forces can fulfill their initial mission—to integrate the capabilities of every Federal law enforcement agency in a coordinated and effective attack against organized crime and drug trafficking syndicates.

I look forward to the day when we have finally fulfilled our 1988 drug bill pledge and have fully funded all its programs.

INCREASE OUR DEFENSE EFFICIENCY

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, earlier this week this body completed work on the Defense authorization bill. I think we can feel pretty good about fitting the necessary defense for our country into the budget figures. Obviously, we may not be spending as much as some people feel is necessary for our defense. Maybe for some in this body, it is spending a lot of money, more than what they think should be spent on defense, but it is a happy compromise that meets the essentials of national defense, considering the budget realities of the time, and particularly the budget realities of Gramm-Rudman, to get ourselves to a balanced budget by 1993.

So I compliment my colleagues on the Senate Armed Services Committee for a job well done. I would like to focus the attention of this body, now, as it reflects on what we just did on the authorization bill, and looking forward to next month on the Defense appropriations bill, on what the Commander in Chief of our armed services had to say to this body in a joint session with the other body on February 9 of this year. I am, of course, referring to President Bush's first message to the Congress. He spoke there about the need for increasing our defense efficiency, and he emphasized in that speech that increased defense efficiency is a key goal of his administration. He said it more specifically this way: "I firmly believe that the first vital step to broaden our national consensus on defense is to wring the last drop of waste and mismanagement out of the way that we buy weapons, and that is what we intend to do." That was President Bush, February 9 to the Congress in a joint session.

Mr. President, I know of no one who favors inefficiency in Department of Defense procurement, and yet we all know that there is a tremendous amount of inefficiency and waste of defense dollars in the procurement that goes on in the Department of Defense. It is, of course, not just the Department of Defense that does not buy enough value for the taxpayers' dollars. It is probably true of a lot of departments of Government. But maybe it's just a little more closely observed in the Department of Defense because there is so much more money to be spent there. It is, after all, about 30 percent of our total Federal Government budget.

I know of no one who advocates inefficiency or mismanagement or fraud in the Defense Department, yet I still feel that not enough is being done even by this Senator to see that we are getting more for our defense dollars.

So we are now in this period of time between the passage of the Defense authorization bill and the Defense appropriations bill. I hope that Congress will review what President Bush said was a major goal of his administration on defense: To wring the last drop of waste and mismanagement out of the way that we buy weapons; that we all concentrate on the President's desire to accomplish this as we move down the road. I hope that the Appropriations Committee, in its deliberations, and I hope even the Senate Armed Services Committee, considering how well they did on the authorization bill, is in the forefront of helping President Bush, even pushing President Bush to do even more and to do it very quickly in his efforts to get more efficiency in the expenditures of our procurement dollars.

Earlier this year about this same time in early February, President Bush ordered the Department of Defense to produce a plan to accomplish his goal. That plan is now, after considerable work within the Department of Defense, back to the President, and I am sure that members of the key committees of the Congress are aware of it. I hope that our respective committees in this body will review the Department of Defense recommendations to President Bush of how they are going to go about the job of accomplishing his mandate in that February 9 message to us in Congress.

One thought that I have about any plan, not just this plan that the President put forth, is that we, of course, have to focus on that plan because that is the one the President is going to use. He will be thinking about that plan and comparing it to any of the recommendations of the past. I think particularly of the recommendations that President Reagan made on defense efficiency and procurement reform. You can talk about the Carlucci initiatives; you can talk about the Packard Commission reports and there are several others that came out in the 8 years of the Reagan administration. In every one of these, Mr. President, the substance of what they were hoping to accomplish was basically on target. But after a period of time of efforts to carry out the recommendations of Carlucci-type initiatives and Packard Commission reports, it seems somehow we end up with the very same results: not much being accomplished and getting more inefficiency for our tax dollars in defense procurement. That old saying about the more things change, the more they remain the same is probably more true about defense reform than almost any other aspect of Government that you could apply that old saying to because in each of these plans, there is a shortcoming. It is not the substance of the proposed reforms that are as important as assuming that they are good proposals. We have had missing essentials from the Carlucci initiatives, we have had them missing from the Packard Commission recommendations, and unless President Bush is especially attentive to his own plan, they are going to be missing there as well.

Those essentials are, first of all, timetables for accomplishing the changes. In other words, timetables for carrying out the substance of the recommendations. Dates, deadlines, and interim reviews of the goals that are supposed to be attained.

Second, the pointing out of what one individual is responsible for accomplishing the changes or the reforms that are suggested.

And, third and most importantly, whose head will roll if changes are not made according to the timetables and the goals to be accomplished.

And so I have to hope that our Armed Services Committee and other respective committees will see that this vacuum in the plan of the President's will be filled and that the President himself, beyond reviewing and ok'ing the substance of the plan, will see that he has a timetable and somebody responsible for seeing that the changes are going to be made and, most importantly, making very clear who is fired if the goals, the substance of the plan is not carried out.

This is most important if the plan is to succeed. The President can just not take that plan that is on his desk and say to the Secretary of Defense, "Move on; carry it out."

As well-meaning as Dick Cheney or any other Secretary of Defense is, I have found in the past you are not going to get attention down through the bureaucracy of the Department of Defense with just the Secretary of Defense seeing that the plan is carried out. The only way this newest plan or the older ones I have referred to will be carried out is if the bureaucracy in the Department of Defense knows that the President is going to almost daily see that the plan is carried out—in other words, that the power and the prestige of the White House is behind the plan and someone on the White House staff oversees the daily performance of carrying it out.

I salute President Bush's commitment to reform enunciated in that February 9, 1989, message to Congress. His commitment to reform is the key to rebuilding public support for our defense programs, and these programs have suffered from repeated incidents of waste, fraud, and mismanagement. Bigger defense budgets have not given more national security. Because of the many problems associated with self-interested politics and the economics of the many different parties involved like the defense industry, the different uniformed services, the different Congresspersons who see the defense budget as a porkbarrel for their districts, and of course large sections of the public competing for the shrinking defense dollar, all of these things considered, more money has not brought us more defense. It is too easy to think in this body of just throwing more money at welfare solving people's needs, throwing more money at education having better education, and throwing more money at defense ending up with a stronger defense. It just is not so.

President Bush and his initiatives can make a big difference. I wish him success and look forward to helping him accomplish his goals and with it then public support, which is very low for the defense budget. The Defense Department, just like any Department of Government, needs public support.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Hawaii is recognized.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator DOLE is recognized for not to exceed 6 minutes.

TIME FOR STREAMLINING THE WAR ON DRUGS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, each and every day we are reminded of the horrors of America's drug epidemic. Each and every day there is a new headline telling us of the tragic loss of life from the drug nightmare. And each and every day we discover anew how far we have to go in the war on drugs.

Just today, there are front page stories reporting how drug gangs from the coasts are exporting their terror and their drugs to America's heartland. Is there any question we have to act—now, not later.

For too long, the war on drugs was just a phrase. But little by little, we have added some muscle and money to the nationwide crusade to wipe out the drug scourge.

On Capitol Hill, Congress has adopted antidrug and anticrime laws. And we did it all with bipartisan support, combining the best ideas on both sides of the aisle into effective legislation. No doubt about it, however, we need to do much, much more—and that is why I am introducing a new concept today to the war on drugs, one that I believe is critical to maximizing congressional efforts to get the job done.

Today I am calling for the establishment of a new committee on Capitol Hill—a super committee on drugs to coordinate, facilitate, and streamline congressional activity.

Mr. President, in 1982, congressional Democrats had a good idea. They called for the creation of a so-called drug czar, a Cabinet-level Director who could cut through the duplication, the bureaucracy, and the politics to maximize America's antidrug efforts. Now, I will admit, the previous administration did not agree with that concept—and it blocked it.

But a good idea is hard to beat and now, with a new President and a new team in place, the drug czar is no longer a concept—he is a reality; and his name is Bill Bennett.

I applaud the Democrats for this initiative. Today, in the form of the outstanding leadership of Mr. Bennett, we are seeing the fruits of their vision.

But now there is a new problem—and the problem is "us." Despite all of our good effort here, there are simply too many cooks in the kitchen. What our newly appointed drug czar needs from Congress is more organization.

A report from the Congressional Research Service identifies 54 House committees and subcommittees and 21 Senate committees and subcommittees which could, and have, asserted jurisdiction over some part of the war on drugs. While this total of 75 may indicate that Congress considers drugs to be a real problem demanding answers, it also points to the need to install some coordination in the Congress and also some streamlining.

Even the number supplied by the CRS is low, since it does not include the Committees on Appropriations and their subcommittees, or any committee or subcommittee with only oversight responsibilities.

If a coordinated approach is good for the executive, and I believe it is, a coordinated approach is good for the Congress.

Assume that you are Mr. Bennett, the drug czar, you only have to go to about 75 different committees. When do you have time to reflect on what you should do in an effort to deal with the drug problems in America, whether it is drugs coming in, whether it is interdiction, whether demand, supply, or education, and whether it is enforcement? So it seems to this Senator that it is time that we do what we asked the executive to do, break down the barriers, deal with the bureaucracies, give some one committee the right authority.

Today I am submitting three resolutions representing three different ways to achieve reorganizing Congress to answer the demand by the public for progress in the war on drugs.

The first concurrent resolution would establish committees on national drug control policy in both the Senate and House—one committee in each. All legislation on the subject of illicit narcotics would be referred to these committees, but committees of existing jurisdiction could make recommendations to the drug committees, which will take advantage of expertise that has been developed over the years.

Membership of the committee in the Senate would include the majority and minority leaders. If, in fact, this is a serious problem, and it ought to be dealt with on the leadership level, then we ought to be able to cut through the redtape.

Also on that committee would be the chairman and ranking minority members of the following committees: Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget, Commerce, Finance, Foreign Relations, Intelligence, Judiciary, and Labor.

In the House, membership would be the Speaker, the minority leader and the chairman and ranking minority members of the committees on: Appropriations, Armed Services, Budget, Energy and Commerce, Merchant Marine, Ways and Means, Foreign Affairs, Intelligence, Judiciary, and Education and Labor.

These committees representing those with major drug jurisdiction including the leadership will provide the new committees with an assurance that its recommendations will be given priority in scheduling before the House and Senate. It will also demonstrate at the highest level that we are serious about the drug problem, not just having hearings, being on television, not making another speech, figuring out how we can get somebody in any administration behind the eight ball before our committee. Congress is serious about finding concrete solutions to the scourge of drugs. I have not met a Member on either side that is not serious about it. This is an opportunity to work it out.

Mr. President, I am aware of the sensitivity of the independence of the two Houses of Congress. Generally, neither tries to mandate the other into taking an action which only affects the other body.

Even though I strongly believe that both the House and the Senate should establish committees, I am also submitting a Senate resolution which would create only a Senate committee—I cannot tell the House what they need to do—leaving to the House the decision on whether to create its own committee and how it should be constituted.

The third resolution, a concurrent resolution like the first, would create a joint committe of both Houses. Like the first concurrent resolution, this would establish a primary committee for both bodies. But, rather than having two committees, one committee serving both bodies would be created. This follows the precedent established by the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy. Due to size limitations, the membership has been reduced to include: The majority and minority leaders of the Senate and two designees of each, and the chairmen and ranking members of the Committees on the Judiciary, Foreign Relations, and Labor and Human Resources. In the House membership would be the Speaker and minority leader and one designee of each, and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the Committees on the Judiciary, Foreign Affairs, Energy and Commerce, Education and Labor.

Whatever approach is taken, it is clear that Congress must restructure itself to fully address the petition by the people to stop drug abuse and abuse by drug addicts and dealers on our society.

The time to act is upon us, since the first national strategy will be before us when we return from the August recess. At that time, we will be confronted with a choice of moving forward with the recommendations of the drug czar, or delaying to await scores of subcommittee hearings and losing the war on drugs.

So you have three options.

One would be a joint committee which I think would be the best option. We would try to keep it small and try to involve the leadership. We would make certain there would be a commitment by the leadership that they would not only be on there by name but they would be there when decisions were being made.

Another would be to establish a separate committee in each House.

And finally, as I said, since we cannot dictate to the House, I have a resolution that would create a special super-Committee on Narcotics and Drugs in the U.S. Senate.

So it is an opportunity. I hope my colleagues on both sides of the aisle would take a hard look. There may be problems. There may be some matter that I have not thought of. Certainly many matters I have not thought of.

The time to act is upon us, since the first national strategy will be before us when we return from the August recess.

We are going to have Mr. Bennett come in at this time. We had Senator BIDEN introduce a plan this past week.

So we are going to be confronted with choices in how we move and how we work with the so-called drug czar or delaying to wait scores of subcommittee hearings.

I think we ought to get at it, do it, and have one committee to be a supercommittee and have the muscle it needs, ought to have the representation it needs, but above all we ought to get our work done and we ought to get the action done to end the drug scourge in America.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I would like to associate myself with the statements by our minority leader, Senator DOLE, that we do know we still have that problem around and are still looking for those answers to fight this war and I would associate myself with his statements.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I yield the floor and I send to the desk the three resolutions and ask that they be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be received and appropriately referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Montana.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed as in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. BURNS. I thank the Chair.

(The remarks of Mr. BURNS pertaining to the introduction of S. 1560 are located in today's RECORD under "Statements on Introduced Bills and Joint Resolutions.")

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York [Mr. D'AMATO].

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I might be permitted to proceed for no longer than 10 minutes as if in morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator has the floor for 10 minutes for the purpose of morning business.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE COUNTERNARCOTICS EFFORTS

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to call the attention of my colleagues to the abysmal performance—and nonperformance—of the Defense Department in spending the $300 million we provided to fund their part in the war on drugs.

Last year, we authorized and appropriated $300 million for DOD to take charge of detection and monitoring of air- and sea-borne smugglers. We put them in charge of integrating the counternarcotics communication system.

Mr. President, I have two questions: Where is the money? and, Who is in charge?

On May 17, I received a letter from Mr. L. Paul Dube "accounting" for the $300 million. According to that letter, $30.2 million had been made available to the services for the National Guard program on April 19, and a total of $200,000 had actually been expended.

That's right, only $200,000 of the $300 million had been spent by May 17, 7½ months into fiscal year 1989!

During the markup of the dire emergency supplemental, I, along with the distinguished senior Senator from Arizona, Senator DECONCINI, offered an amendment to take $227.8 million of the $300 million away from DOD and give it to other agencies that are actually fighting the war on drugs.

That amendment lost, because OMB argued that it violated the budget summit agreement. As part of the debate on that amendment, DOD promised to spend the money we had provided.

On July 7, the Department sent over two reprogramming requests to move approximately $193 million from the "Drug Interdiction, Defense, 1989" account into a variety of procurement and research and development accounts. I cannot be more specific because the actual requests are classified.

I wrote to the distinguished chairman and the distinguished ranking member of the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee, requesting an immediate hearing on these reprogramming requests. Because time was so short, my request could not be accommodated. However, the chairman responded that there would be a special hearing on DOD counternarcotics efforts after we return from the August recess.

Mr. President, we need to know what is going on with DOD's drug war effort. I understand that there is at least one classified section of the national drug strategy due to be issued on September 5 that will discuss the military's role in the drug war. We need to know more.

We need a plan—not just any plan, but one that meets Defense Department planning, programming, and budget standards for tackling the drug war. We do not have such a plan.

We need to have someone in charge over there. We do not have anyone in charge now. What we have is a recipe for disaster.

We have the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Reserve Affairs, Mr. Stephen Duncan, serving as the Secretary's principal adviser on narcotics matters. We are told that the Office of the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Drug Policy and Enforcement, is being moved into Mr. Duncan's organization.

But most of the budget authority will continue to rest in agencies and offices under the supervision of the Assistant Secretary of Defense for Command, Control, Communications, and Intelligence.

The Pacific Command, Atlantic Command, Southern Command, and the North American Air Defense Command are the operating agencies in the war on drugs, but DOD-level supervision of their drug war budget activities will be split, as will counternarcotics policy development and planning.

I repeat—Who is in charge here? The answer cannot be Dick Cheney, because, like President Bush, he has a few other high priority items competing for his time and attention.

DOD needs a single manager for the war on drugs, in whom policy, planning, programming, and budgeting functions are focused. Right now, we cannot hold any one person accountable if the Department's efforts are disorganized and late. A basic principle is that when many people are responsible, no one is responsible.

Last night, we authorized another $450 million for DOD's role in the war on drugs. Will it again take them most of fiscal year 1990 to make the money available? Will part of it expire at the end of the year because they have not used it?

This is a scandal and an outrage. At a time when we say we are nationalizing and mobilizing our efforts on the war on drugs, to have almost all of the $300 million unspent, poorly allocated, with a rush to beat the spending deadline.

The time has come for the Defense Department to put its first team to work on this problem, to sort out the organizational lines of authority, to make budget and policy decisionmaking functional and effective, and to actually start fighting the war on drugs!

They have sat on their hands long enough. I plan to ask them very tough questions at the forthcoming hearing. I am giving them fair notice, so that they will have time to develop good answers.

Alone among Federal agencies, DOD has the resources, the experience, and the ability to make a serious dent in drug smuggling and to discourage other aspects of the international drug trade.

Mr. President, I serve public notice that it is time for DOD to join the team. If they do not, they will bear the blame for it, and will lose the resources we have authorized. I am dead serious about this and I hope they receive this message loud and clear.

Mr. President, to date their handling of these resources, these precious resources, is nothing short of shocking and scandalous. We must do better, otherwise we make a sham of the so-called war on drugs.

I thank the Chair and I yield the floor.

COMPROMISE PLAN FOR FSLIC BAILOUT

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, I rise to offer my support for the compromise that was reached by the Senate and the House in last night's conference. As an ardent advocate for truth in budgeting, I was strongly in favor of financing the FSLIC bailout on budget. However, due to the administration's efforts to block an on-budget resolution of this crisis, the conference committee was forced to reconvene and arrived at what I believe to be an adequate solution.

The most promising development that I saw arise out of our debate on the Senate floor yesterday was the growing recognition of the deceitful budget games we play year after year. I hope our discussion has brought more attention to the need for honest budgeting and the need to proceed swiftly with systemic reform of the budget process.

The agreement reached in the conference places $20 billion of the $50 billion necessary to resolve current insolvencies on-budget in fiscal year 1989. This on-budget action will provide for direct Treasury financing, and the minute the bill is signed, we can begin to redress the monumental problems facing the savings and loan industry. While I would prefer that the remaining $30 billion also be treated in this manner, in the interest of compromise and, more importantly, in the interest of the American taxpayer, I urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

We cannot allow the financing aspect of the bailout plan to halt the passage of this legislation. Every day that we continue to debate on-budget versus off-budget, costs the taxpayers an estimated $20 million. The compromise we have reached is not the final solution to the problem, but it is a good beginning. Again, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support the conference report on the FSLIC legislation. It is imperative that we act in a timely manner to save taxpayer dollars and restrict this crisis from becoming more of a burden on the budget. It is equally important that we carry the lessons we have learned from deceitful budgeting as we consider approaches to reforming the current budget process.

THE OAKAR AMENDMENT

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, I would like to address a substantive problem I have with the legislation under consideration. My concern relates to the provisions of the so-called Oakar amendment that relate to mergers of banks and thrifts. Under those provisions, the subsidiaries of the bank holding company that effect the merger must be, in aggregate, twice the size of the thrift that is merged into a bank subsidiary of the holding company. That is an unfortunate restriction. It had been my thought that this section of the bill could provide, in States such as North Carolina in which there are a number of small and medium sized thrifts from $50 to 750 million in assets, and relatively few banks of comparable size, the option of permitting mergers of a larger thrift with a smaller commercial bank, thus supplying a publicly beneficial competitive alternative to the handful of major banks that control three-quarters of our State's banking assets.

Since the bill does not authorize such mergers, it is my hope that this matter could be revisited in the near future. I plan to confer with the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee to see what options are available to us from both a regulatory and legislative standpoint.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. GRAHAM. I thank the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE DEBT LIMIT

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, while we have been whiling away the hours waiting to see if somehow we could dispose of a pending amendment which I guess is the amendment of Senator HELMS having to do with war heroes who are about to lose their pensions, I have been spending the time in the cloakroom looking at Stephen Pile's very interesting book entitled the "Book of Heroic Failures."

It is a wonderful volume that recounts in some detail things like the least savings, the least successful newspaper, the least successful safety film, the least successful animal rescue, the worst phrase book, the least accurately labled museum exhibit, the worst ankle, the least successful cricket match, so on and so forth.

One of the most interesting anecdotes it contains concerns the firemen's strike of 1948 which gave volunteer firemen in the city of London the opportunity to show their mettle.

On one particular occasion that is recounted in this volume, the firemen were called out by a distressed lady whose cat was trapped at the top of a telephone pole. The volunteers arrived with impressive speed and very quickly rescued the cat.

The woman was overjoyed, so much so she invited the fire volunteers into her home for tea and crumpets, and presently, having had a nice occasion, they departed, waving found farewells and as they backed out of the driveway, ran over the cat.

I have not seen in this book an account of the least successful effort to balance the budget, but I presume in due course that we will have somebody write a book about the series of well-intentioned but completely unsuccessful efforts to get Federal spending under control.

Here we are on the evening of the night that we are scheduled to go out on recess and just predictably we are getting ready to once again raise the debt limit.

It seems almost a familiar story. We have done it over and over again.

I wonder if while we are waiting to resolve these other issues it would not be timely for us to ask ourselves what is going on here, to ask ourselves what is the surest sign that a person or a family or maybe a nation is heading for financial disaster.

I guess I think people are in trouble financially when they cannot control their spending, when their credit card bills remain unpaid, when the bills keep rising, when the loans are overdue, when somehow they cannot curb the impluse to spend.

How can you tell when a business is fighting off bankruptcy? When it starts hounding customers to speed up their payments and at the same time it stiff-arms those they owe money to. I have seen it a lot of times. In fact, Mr. President, at one stage in my career I spent a very considerable amount of time trying to collect bills from people who were doing exactly that.

That, by the way, is what the Federal Government is doing. Obviously, these are not new insights and you all know that is exactly what is happening with the U.S. Government. We are stiff-arming creditors, trying to speed up payments, resorting to golden gimmicks and gradually falling deeper and deeper into debt.

The United States is very much like such an individual—buying more than we can pay for, sliding into financial oblivion.

Mr. President, later this evening I anticipate that we are going to consider another in a long series of extensions of the debt.The legislation which I believe will be called up shortly will raise the statutory debt ceiling by some $70 billion above its present level of $2.8 trillion. By my count, this will be the 58th time in the last 49 years that we have done so; 42 times in the last 25 years alone.

In fact, raising the debt ceiling, just borrowing more and more to finance the continuing shortfall, is just a way of life around here.

If you have a temporary shortfall, if we just somehow cannot make ends meet once or twice, we do not think too much of it. At least in our household we would not think that was an unusual occurrence. When it happens every year for 29 years in a row you begin to think maybe that is a trend. That is how long it has been since we had a balanced budget in this country.

How did we get in this mess? I do not think the answer is very distant. And despite all of the political hyperventilation, of which there has been plenty, it is not caused by spending on national defense. As every Senator knows, spending to defend this country against foreign enemies has declined steadily as a percentage of the budget and as a percentage of the gross national product for a generation.

In 1960, Federal spending for national defense was about half the budget. Today it is a little under 25 percent. In the meantime, spending for what are euphemistically called social programs has mushroomed, it has skyrocketed, gone completely out of control.

Some of the fans of this kind of spending would have us believe that the deficit is caused by tax cuts.

Mr. President, I believe that the evidence is so clear that no one should take that notion seriously. But let me just cite for the record what has happened to Federal tax revenues in recent years. They went from $92 billion in 1960 to $193 billion in 1970, going to $517 billion in 1980, and to an estimated $1.065 trillion in 1990.

During the course of that 20-year period, rates were adjusted, deductions were adjusted, the various parameters of the Federal tax system were adjusted. But in the aggregate, from 1960 to 1990, the total amount of Federal tax collections increased by a little over 1100 percent, going from $92 billion to about $1.1 trillion.

It is hard for me to believe that Senators or anybody else thinks that as a country we are under-taxed.

Mr. President, during the same period of time, tax revenues increased about twice as fast as inflation. So it is not a case that inflation has eaten up the increase in revenues. We simply spent more every year.

The source of that explosion? Well, it is the domestic spending program. In 1960, 52 percent of the budget was defense spending. In fiscal 1990 it will be, according to my computation, exactly 25.1 percent.

Where did the deficit come from? Entitlements is obviously the biggest portion. In fact, under President Bush's 5-year plan defense as a percentage of gross national product will be lower than it ever was under President Carter.

Truly a remarkable realization when you recall that just a few years ago President Reagan was elected and President Carter was turned out of office due in large part to the widely held belief that Mr. Carter had budgeted too little in spending for national defense. Here we are, a number of years later, spending only about the same amount as Jimmy Carter proposed, less after inflation, but only about the same amount in nominal dollars, than Jimmy Carter proposed almost a decade ago.

The facts are daunting. Outlays for fiscal 1990 are projected to be $1.2 trillion, virtually double spending of a decade before. Federal spending has gone from $320 billion in 1981 to $543 billion in 1989, an increase of 69 percent.

Federal spending overall is more than $4,600 per person in the United States, an increase from $2,600 per person in 1980.

The Citizens for a Sound Economy talks about the national debt in these terms. Just talking about the national debt, the Citizens for a Sound Economy tell us that at a rate of $10,000 a minute, it would take 560 years to pay off the national debt.

According to the National Taxpayers Union, the national debt is enough to paper Washington, DC, wall to wall, with $100 bills and still have enough left over to give every Member of Congress about $93 million apiece. The Federal Government is now going into debt at the rate of $3.2 billion each week, $460 million each day, $19 million an hour, $319,000 a minute or about $5,300 per second.

Interest on the national debt is now the third largest item in the Federal budget. Net interest on the debt for fiscal 1990 will reach $176.3 billion; the current annual interest payment would have run the entire Federal Government as recently as fiscal year 1967.

Interest payments on today's national debt represent an average annual tax payment, a burden on each family on the average, just for interest, of $2,300, and now consume over one-half of all of the income tax revenues from individuals in this country.

Somebody might ask, how could the situation get worse? Well, the answer is, Mr. President: barring an extraordinary change of heart for America, it is going to get worse tonight by about $70 billion because that is what we are going to be asked to vote on. Unless I am very pleasantly but very much surprised, that is going to pass.

I am going to vote against it. There will be others who will. But it is going to be about another $70 billion in debt imposed upon the people of this country.

Mr. President, there are a couple of other matters about this legislation which I personally find especially harmful.

Section 2 of the bill establishes that the debt limit increase is only to a date certain, which means that we are authorizing, encouraging, in fact, the Treasury to borrow money, the authority for which will expire on a certain date. That means, on that date, if there is not a further extension, there will be a rollback, a practice which seems to me to be the height of fiscal irresponsibility.

It is a scheme, obviously, that the advocates of the bill have in mind to give them additional leverage to force the Congress to enact still further increases in the national debt.

Mr. President, Thomas Jefferson has been thought of as one of the great visionary leaders of our country. He was a man who had a broad-gauge of America and he was one who thought that every generation ought to have the right to frame its own constitution and to set up its own ground rules for the operation of the Government. Yet Thomas Jefferson thought there was one thing that was missing in the Constitution of the United States and that was an amendment which would prevent Congress from deficit spending.

Mr. Jefferson put it this way, and I quote:

> We consider ourselves unauthorized to saddle posterity with our debts.

Thomas Jefferson was not the only thinker of the colonial and revolutionary and early Federal period that thought deficit spending was a big mistake. In fact, the reason why an antideficit provision does not appear in our Constitution, I believe, is because it was almost unthinkable that Congress would be so foolhardy as to run a debt, and certainly to do so on repeated and regular occasions seemed so farfetched that there was no need to enact a constitutional prohibition against it.

In fact, it was not just thinkers of the revolutionary and colonial and early Federal period that had this idea. It was the basic belief, in fact it was a part of the unwritten constitution of the United States until about 25 years ago.

I guess, really, more like 30 years ago.

There were not any large peacetime deficits until then. Yes, we did run large national debts during the Civil War and during World War I and II, but then they were repaid during the years after that and that was thought to be a customary and regular thing, that the country would be expected to live within its means.

Mr. President, it is only in the last 30 years, really since the fateful decision of President Johnson and those who were in Congress at the time to opt for both guns and butter, that we have run up these enormous national debts.

In fact, Mr. President, as we contemplate a $1.1-trillion annual expenditure of Government, it would be well to remember that as recently as the time of President Johnson, $100 billion seemed like an incredible amount. In fact, Mr. Johnson was seen to more or less publicly agonize over whether or not he wanted to be the first President to submit a budget which would propose to spend, in a single year, as much as $100 billion.

So, Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the author of this interesting "Book of Heroic Failures," by Stephen Pile, is still writing. But if he is not, somebody ought to take up the challenge and write the story of the least successful effort in history to get the budget balanced, because this is it.

I guess, as I think of it, that is what the Senate is doing. We are writing that story and we are going to write another chapter tonight.

Mr. President, before I yield the floor I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point an interesting table taken from the budget documents comparing the level of public debt over the last four decades and, at the same time, Mr. President, to have printed in the RECORD a report on the cost of the interest on the debt compared to income tax revenue.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[1] Gross Federal Debt—Gross Federal Debt is composed of debt owned by the public and debt held by Federal Government accounts. Government accounts that hold debt are predominantly social insurance trust funds: Social Security, Medicare, Civil Service Retirement, Military Retirement, and Unemployment. Income into these accounts not needed for current benefits is used to purchase Treasury Securities or, in effect, loaned to the general fund.

[2] Public Debt—Federal debt held by the public is all debt excluding that held by government accounts. The "public" includes any person or institution other than the Federal Government (i.e., individuals, private banks, insurance companies, the Federal Reserve Banks, and foreign central banks.)

[3] Debt Subject to Limit—This is the amount of federal debt the Treasury is authorized to borrow. Since the beginning of the Republic, Congress has authorized a specific amount of debt for each separate issue. Beginning with the Second Liberty Bond Act of 1917 and subsequent amendments, the current statutory debt ceiling was established. This amount includes nearly all Gross Federal Debt. A small amount not included consists of certain certificates no longer issued and a small portion of agency debt.

TAKING SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS OFF BUDGET FOR PURPOSES OF DEFICIT REDUCTION CALCULATION

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, one of the final pieces of business we hope to accomplish tonight is to address the temporary increase in the debt ceiling. Of course, with the exception of wartime obligations, the Congress has traditionally eschewed debt as the surest road from economic vigor to financial anemia.

Unfortunately, our national debt has tripled in this decade and is expected to double again in the next. This growing mountain of debt obviously threatens the economic future of this country.

I had intended to offer an amendment this evening to the debt ceiling bill that would have removed, by increments, the Social Security trust fund surpluses used in our calculation of the yearly deficit. There are three very important and principal reasons why this amendment is not only appropriate but I think primary to any discussion of the national debt. I trust that as I review these three points that the sense of urgency I feel will become clear to my colleagues. While I will not press my amendment to a vote tonight, I want to put all my colleagues on notice, Mr. President, that when this debt ceiling expires, as it is expected to in just a few very short months, I intend to be back here on the floor, hopefully with a lot of similarly minded Members, so we can address this problem properly, strongly, and effectively by legislation.

I said a moment ago that the amendment I would have offered would freeze the Social Security surplus at its projected level in fiscal year 1991—$79 billion, and only this amount can be counted against the deficit through fiscal year 1993, and second, recover the funds borrowed by increments in a very short order. It seems to me that unless we take this approach it will allow the Congress to continue its practice of what I can only describe as clandestine borrowing from the Social Security Trust Fund reserves to mask the true size of our national debt. By doing this we permit, indeed encourage, our debt to keep spiraling upward.

By the end of 1993, when Gramm-Rudman-Hollings finally runs its course, the deficit, of course, is supposed to be zero. But what we are going to find, Mr. President, is that we are still $103 billion in the red—an amount identical to that year's projected trust fund surplus. The deficit is expected to decline from 100, 64, 28, on down to 0 in fiscal year 1993; in fact, we will still be counting for purposes of deficit reduction the Old Age and Survivors Insurance Disability Fund. What we see are receipts over disbursement climbing and continuing to climb. These receipts become debt to the Treasury. And, indeed, our real deficit in the general fund of the Treasury in 1993 will not be zero, as we report it; it will be $103 billion.

That is a lot of money. After that it will be $117 billion. We will report it as zero in all probability and each year, even if we report the Federal budget deficit as zero, our national debt will be growing by 100, by 117, by 134, by 150, by 168 and on up each year so that the national debt will, indeed, on top of already having tripled, will double in another 10 years.

Mr. President, we will find a river of red ink, a tide of rising debt. And it is time for the Congress to admit, both to itself and to the American public, that we can no longer afford to postpone tough choices in order to make them seem less painful.

I have to admit that the amendment I have in mind is going to force us to make some additional tough choices. That is what happens when you stop putting more and more debt on the younger generation. We have to make choices for ourselves instead of reducing theirs by taking from their posterity.

There is no question that the amendment that I am talking about is going to force us to either make spending cuts or raise additional revenue or work out some combination of those two. That is what we have been doing under Gramm-Rudman for the last 3 or 4 years. That is what we will be doing under Gramm-Rudman, at least through 1993, and that is what we are going to have to do more of if we want to be honest with the American public and true to future generations.

But we will have replaced our practices of fiscal fakery with financial honesty. I believe that is what the American public wants and deserves from Congress.

Second, my amendment honors our obligation to the Social Security trust funds for current and future retirees. Right now those promises are being broken, and I hope everyone will recollect that when President Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law some 54 years ago, he sealed a compact in which we have all joined—the governor and the public. Yet, Congress, I fear, right now undermines the very spirit of this compact and risks defaulting on its obligation through the misapplication of trust fund reserves.

The problem, of course, is that the surpluses we apply to the deficit today are owed to the retirees in the future. It is the responsibility of Congress to ensure that when those baby boomers reach retirement age in the next century, and it is not all that far away, that they receive the benefits to which they are entitled. According to the intermediate projections of the 1989 Social Security Board of Trustees Report, in 2020 the balance of the Old Age Survivors Insurance and Disability Trust Funds will be $2.8 trillion in today's dollars—not inflated dollars—this is roughly equal to the amount of debt that we have on our books today.

If we continue to pillage these funds, I ask my colleagues who oppose this approach to tell me where, in addition to the roughly $3 trillion that we seem determined to vote in debt tonight, are we going to get the next $3 trillion or $2.8 trillion that will be owed to those beneficiaries? If the trust funds are not protected, the Government will have to slash Social Security benefits, raise taxes or borrow still more from the public.

Talk about unattractive choices, Mr. President. Those really are, because we are talking not billions of dollars, not $10 billion here or $10 billion there. We are talking about trillions of dollars. In this Congress, thank God, a trillion dollars is still real money.

There is some irony that Congress saved the Social Security goose 5 years ago only to now melt down the golden egg.

I say that because in 1983 the bipartisan commission on Social Security, a forum on which I served, organized by President Reagan, and ably chaired by Alan Greenspan, crafted the rescue of the then troubled program. The short-term crisis was resolved and the trust fund revenues began to grow.

By using these funds as we are today, we are literally undoing what the commission has done, and push the program back to a precipice of disaster.

The third reason why this amendment is appropriate to any discussion of the national debt is the issue of interest. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, I think we all admit, was a commitment to reduce Government borrowing and thus simultaneously reduce interest paid out on Government debt.

Our current use of Social Security reserves simply replaces one form of borrowing with another. Instead of reducing the interest burden on the Government, we are adding to it. The numbers speak for themselves.

We already pay out more than $1 in every $4 of our non-Social Security revenues just to make interest payments on this debt that we are voting on tonight. If we continue to postpone honest reduction efforts, by the year 2000, just 10 years away, as much as $6 out of every $10 of all such revenues will be required to cover interest due. Think of it, $6 out of every $10, not $1 out of every $4 as now.

Of the total interest owed on the national debt within 5 years, $46 billion will be owed to the trust funds alone. This would not be the case if we took the Social Security trust funds off budget. We simply cannot continue to mortgage our future in this way.

Mr. President, what I am suggesting is that we must carefully weigh the consequences of again doubling the national debt in interest in the next decade. If budget deficits are eliminated, the scheduled accumulation of Social Security reserves could result in a surplus in the total budget. We would be able to buy in the entire publicly-held portion of the national debt by the year 2007.

The Social Security system would own most of the debt, and I think we would show a tremendous increase in national savings. Instead of competing with the private sector as the Treasury does every morning on Monday morning when it refunds and issues new debt, and instead of having to try to borrow increasing amounts of money from foreign interests, we would have the Treasury sitting at home tending our knitting and the private sector would be able to make this economy roll. The cost of capital would drop and we would see, I believe, probably the greatest economic expansion that we would ever have found in the history of our country.

Mr. President, as you and others may know, I have addressed our colleagues on this issue before, and I am pleased that on May 3 this year, the Senate passed a resolution which I offered, together with Senator MOYNIHAN and Senator HATCH, to restore truth and accuracy to the budget process by removing the Social Security trust funds from our budget calculations. I offered in support of that resolution the findings of the National Economic Commission, the General Accounting Office and a broad range of economists, policy analysts and interest groups.

In fact, speaking of the National Economic Commission, on which several of our most distinguished Members served, there was a lot of disagreement over how to tame the budget deficit. The one and only one recommendation that they unanimously agreed upon is that the Social Security trust fund should be removed from the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction game.

I ask that a list of all the economists who support the concept of removing the Social Security trust fund surpluses out of the Federal deficit calculations be published at the end of my comments today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, the amendment that I intended to offer tonight is similar to the sense-of-the-Senate resolution. First, it would leave the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets in place. Second, it would freeze the Social Security surplus at its projected level for fiscal year 1991, $79 billion, and only that amount could be counted against the deficit through 1993. Third, it would remove the Social Security trust fund from that deficit counting game by reducing that $79 billion in several equal annual steps starting at the end of fiscal 1993. Finally, we would allow 4 years to take those final steps.

As we address the debt ceiling bill tonight, I think it is critical to recognize that it will soon be impossible to pass any further increases in the debt ceiling unless this problem is addressed. There must be a feasible solution to this growing national debt that is being fed by the willingness of our colleagues to still treat these Social Security surplus funds as some kind of piggy bank into which we can dip at any time.

So I urge my colleagues' support for a plan that would ensure future retiree benefits as well as a reduction in the national debt. Every day we postpone removing the trust funds, Mr. President, the more difficult and intimidating that task will become. The day of reckoning for honest budgeting cannot be postponed for future generations. That day is now. I ask my colleagues to carefully consider this proposal as a pledge to honest budgeting and a healthy economy.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, for the benefit and information of Senators who have been patiently waiting, I am about to propound a unanimous-consent request covering the disposition of those matters which remain, and on which action must be completed prior to the recess.

I will now state the unanimous-consent request, and, if there is no objection to it, then I will make brief further comments thereafter about the schedule for the remainder of this session.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the majority leader, after consultation with the Republican leader, may proceed to the consideration with the Republican leader, may proceed to the consideration of the conference report to accompany H.R. 1278, the Financial Institutions Reform Recovery and Enforcement Act, and that it be considered under the following time limitation: 60 minutes overall on the consideration of the conference report, with 30 minutes equally divided and controlled between Senators RIEGLE and GARN, 15 minutes under the control of Senator GRAHAM, 10 minutes under the control of Senator EXON, and 5 minutes under the control of Senator CONRAD; with all points of order against the conference report being waived.

I further ask unanimous consent that, following the expiration of time listed for the debate, there be an immediate vote on adoption of the conference report with no intervening action or debate.

I further ask unanimous consent that, upon disposition of the conference report, the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of H.R. 3024, the short-term debt limit extension bill, that it be considered under the following time limitation: 20 minutes equally divided between Senators BENTSEN and PACKWOOD or their designees; that no amendments, motions, or points of order be in order; that, upon the completion or yielding back of the time, of the Senate without any intervening action vote on final passage of H.R. 3024.

I further ask unanimous consent that, immediately upon the disposition of H.R. 3024, the Senate resume consideration of the Treasury, Postal appropriations bill, H.R. 2989; that the pending Nickles and Helms amendments be withdrawn; that the only amendment in order be an amendment by Senator GRASSLEY; that upon disposition of the Grassley amendment the bill be read a third time and passed, and, that the foregoing be completed without any intervening action or debate; and that the Chair be authorized to appoint conferees.

I further ask unanimous consent that the only remaining action, other than items cleared by the two leaders, to be considered before the Senate recesses, be the adjournment resolution on which no amendments, motions, or points of order shall be in order.

I further ask unanimous consent that no later than 12 noon on November 3, the Senate proceed to a bill to be introduced by Senator HELMS identical to the language of amendment 694, on which there will be 4 hours of debate, to be equally divided between Senators HELMS and MITCHELL; that no amendments or points of order be in order; that upon the conclusion or yielding back of time, the Senate proceed to vote, without any intervening action or debate, on final passage of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, may I withhold the approval momentarily?

Mr. President, I am advised that action on the Treasury, Postal appropriations bill will, if this order is accepted, be very brief, taking not more than a few minutes. Accordingly, I modify my request solely to reverse or change the order of the disposition of the various matters, as propounded, to permit action on the Treasury, Postal appropriations bill to occur first, following which, we would then proceed to the savings and loan legislation, and then short-term debt bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object. With reference to the Treasury, Postal Service bill, I heard that part of the request with reference to the appointment of the conferees by the Chair. Was there a provision or language provided for insistence on the Senate amendments in requesting the conference with the House? That should be included.

Mr. MITCHELL. I modify my request to include the language by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so modified.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I do want the record to clearly show at this point that I register my profound opposition to what we are doing tonight and how we are doing it. I think it is a very serious mistake for us to pass on a voice vote a measure of this magnitude, without further debate. With that, I will not object.

Mr. KASTEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. KASTEN. Reserving my right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, I today express my intense concern about the impending passage of the proposed S&L bailout plan.

I voted for the Senate version of this legislation. I did so with strong reservations, yet with the hope that the House action on the bill, and the ensuing House-Senate conference, would improve upon the measure we passed.

Hopes have not been met. The bill we are about to pass will not provide a long-term solution to the problems afflicting America's savings and loans. On the contrary—the path we are about to follow may well bring us, in future years, to the same sad state of affairs that made this plan necessary.

The S&L conference report will cost the taxpayer $13.3 billion more than the measure the Senate originally passed. But it takes us further and further away from a permanent solution. And not only that: it unfairly penalizes the S&L industries in States like my own—Wisconsin—and subsidizes the irresponsible practices of S&L's in other parts of the country.

The ideal reform would be to close immediately all insolvent S&L's, promptly compensate depositors on their insured accounts at those S&L's, and then move toward a risk-based Federal deposit insurance system.

Mr. President, on an issue of this importance, I think it is essential that individual Senators make their views known in an unequivocal manner. Ordinarily, the best way to ensure this kind of individual responsibility is a rollcall vote.

However, due to the pressing nature of our parliamentary situation, I will not insist on a rollcall vote. But I want the record to be clear that I am voting "no" on this conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who seeks recognition?

Mr. DECONCINI addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. DECONCINI. I do not intend to object, but I have to state the same feelings that the Senator from Wisconsin has in wanting the record to be very clear that I intend to vote against the bill. I cast no aspersions on the fine work of the conference committee, but I cannot vote for this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, it is not my intention to seek a rollcall vote on the various measures remaining for action. Senators should be aware, of course, that neither I nor the distinguished Republican leader can prevent Senators from requesting such a vote. I know of no such intention at this time.

Accordingly, if no such request is made, there will be no rollcall vote this evening on these matters. I would caution Senators that House action remains to take place after completion of our consideration of the savings and loan legislation, and we do not know what the result of that action will be.

It is possible that this matter has not been finally disposed of in the Senate, but we must await final disposition of the matter in the House, following the action we take here.

I conclude by thanking all of my colleagues for their patience and cooperation. It has taken several hours to arrange for us to reach this point. While I recognize that many Senators, for a wide variety of reasons—often directly conflicting reasons—would prefer another course of action, I believe this is the one best calculated to achieve the result that is most desirable for the Senate and the country.

I yield the floor.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, just very briefly, it is the understanding, of course, between the two leaders, and hopefully all of our colleagues, that there will be no requests for a rollcall vote, because I think, based on what we have done thus far, some Members probably feel free to leave. And we hope there is no request for a vote. It will take a long time to work this out. I think we have accommodated all concerns.

If people are against this proposal, they can put a strong statement in the RECORD, and it will be read with interest.

Mr. BYRD. I am sure the leaders are aware that the agreement itself does not rule out a rollcall vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is correct.

Mr. METZENBAUM. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader still has the floor.

Does he yield for a question?

Mr. MITCHELL. I yield to the Senator from Ohio for a question.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I am a little curious. Is there some reason we cannot get unanimous consent that there not be any rollcalls in connection with these three bills, so that we could feel free to leave and not be taken by surprise?

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator would withhold and permit me to discuss it, this has been a subject of several hours of discussion.

Mr. METZENBAUM. I appreciate the efforts of the leader. I withhold.

Mr. CONRAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The majority leader has the floor.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. I would like, at the appropriate time, to deliver my statement explaining my position.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is protected in the unanimous-consent order, but the first order of business will be the Treasury appropriation which I understand will now proceed very quickly. I am advised that Senator GRASSLEY is not going to offer his amendment, and then we will be on the S&L bill.

TREASURY, POSTAL SERVICE, AND GENERAL GOVERNMENT APPROPRIATION BILL 1990

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending order of business is H.R. 2989.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, let me thank the majority leader and the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, Senator BYRD; the minority leader; and of course, the Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS; for making arrangements tonight that we can pass H.R. 2989.

Mr. President, due to the time, I am not going to reiterate or even summarize what is in this bill. It is in the statement about 8 hours ago.

The Senator from New Mexico and myself went over it in great detail as to what is in this bill, what it does, in very specific areas.

I am deeply grateful that the Senate is going to let us work our will and pass this bill tonight.

I know that in the category of importance, maybe the saving and loan bill has a greater significance in some minds, but to me, this is an operational bill of the Treasury, Postal Service and other general Government agencies, including the IRS and many other agencies, and it is imperative that we pass this bill and get on to conference.

I am hopeful that we can do so in the next couple minutes.

I yield to my friend from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the chairman for his work and the chairman of the full committee for helping and the leadership for getting us at this point.

I have nothing further to add.

I am not at all sure whether the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRASSLEY] wants to offer an amendment.

He does not intend to offer the amendment that was reserved.

So we have nothing remaining.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Iowa also.

I agree in principle with the amendment the Senator was going to offer. I realize that he had that right to do so, and the source of the offset of the cost of his amendment would have taken us considerable time to debate and go into, and I am grateful that he has agreed to let this go on so we can get on to the business of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the engrossment of the amendments and third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

So the bill (H.R. 2989) was passed.

Mr. DECONCINI. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOMENICI. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist on its amendments to H.R. 2989, agree to the conference requested by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer (Mr. ADAMS) appointed Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BYRD, Ms. MIKULSKI, Mr. KERREY, Mr. DOMENICI,

Mr. HATFIELD, and Mr. D'AMATO conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the chairman of the subcommittee again, Mr. DECONCINI, and the ranking member, Mr. DOMENICI, for their excellent work, their fine teamwork, their great cooperation and expertise, and I compliment them on the skill with which they have handled the markups, the hearings and management of the bill on the floor.

I also think the two leaders, Mr. MITCHELL and Mr. DOLE, for helping us to unravel this Gordian knot at the end of this calendar day, and their help is deeply appreciated by all, I am sure.

Let me also thank Mr. HELMS and Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. SIMPSON had a great deal to do with this. He was a great bit of yeast in the dough at the end of the day.

And I thank Mr. HELMS again for withdrawing the amendment and helping us reach an agreement which allowed the passage of this bill before we recessed for August.

It puts us in a good position now for the staffs to do the work at some point during the recess that will have to be taken up in conference. It will help to expedite the final action in the conference.

I am grateful to all concerned; again my deep appreciation to all members of the Appropriations Committee on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. President, one postscript. I thank the excellent staffs on the Appropriations Committee on both sides, Democratic and Republican. They are nonpartisan. They are Patty Lynch, Ursula Maurer, Rebecca Davies, and Judee Klepec.

Without them, we could not hope to be where we are today.

I know those staff people. I have seen them not work 8 hours a day but 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16 hours a day. And they are here sometimes before I get here and sometimes after I leave for the most part. I deeply appreciate their work, their loyalty, dedication and the skill that they constantly demonstrate, which can only come with experience, and that is why we are so proud of our staffs.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS REFORM, RECOVERY, AND ENFORCEMENT ACT—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I submit a report of the committee of conference on H.R. 1278 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 1278) to reform, recapitalize, and consolidate the Federal deposit insurance system, to enhance the regulatory and enforcement powers of Federal financial institutions regulatory agencies, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their repective Houses this report, signed by a majority of the conferees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

(The conference report is printed in the House proceedings of the RECORD of today, August 4, 1989.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, the conference report on the saving and loan reform package is at the desk. It is roughly 1,000 pages.

I think it is the best bill possible to craft under the circumstances. It will make major reforms in every respect in terms of strengthening and improving, setting up tougher and higher standards in that industry in the future.

It is signed by all five conferees.

I will only make one other point with respect to the funding dispute. We worked out an agreement last night in the conference that would put $20 billion of the spending on budget in fiscal 1989 and the remaining $30 billion planned spending would be spent over the next 2 fiscal years in the REFCORP arrangement and would not be shown on the budget.

That is not precisely to the liking of any of us, but it is the nature of working out strong disagreements that compromises of this kind have to be developed.

The President has indicated he intends to sign the bill if it is passed. I think it is urgent that the bill be passed. I think if this bill were not passed and signed into law quickly, the losses would continue to mount and I think far more threatening events could arise with respect to the stability of the industry.

It would be my hope that the Congress as a whole, first the Senate now, and the House later, will enact this legislation and send it down for the President's signature.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, the hour is late and we need to get on with this legislation. Then let me just make a few remarks.

This is a difficult bill, one as the chairman has mentioned that is over 1,000 pages long.

He and I in the Banking Committee of the Senate have labored for 6 months to try and come up to a solution to this problem. I do not think it would make any difference what kind of a bill that we arrived at tonight. There would be Members on both sides of the aisle who would stand up who have not been part of the process and say, "We don't like it; we are going to vote against it."

I understand that. I have done that before on bills myself that I did not like.

I think we have to recognize the seriousness of the problem. Well over $100 billion is going to be paid by the taxpayers of this country, without doubt the biggest single bill in the history of this country. So we may not have it the way we like it. Certainly if I could write it, I would do things differently. I would remove the housing provisions even if I agreed with them, because this is not the place and the time on a rescue bill to be putting extraneous provisions on.

There are other provisions that I would like to change, and I certainly do not like the financing method or the compromise that we agreed to last night, but I emphasize the nature of the problem and the fact that for every day it has taken to get to this point, it has cost the taxpayer at least $20 million.

So I urge my colleagues in the House to recognize what the core issue is, what the problem is, and what we set out to do 6 months ago. And to recognize even though there are things that they would like to change that if they do and they defeat the bill tonight, they are responsible for the taxpayers' coughing up an additional $20 million a day. That will be another $40 million by Monday and every day that goes by.

I would not like that kind of responsibility on my shoulders, and I am sure the chairman and the vast majority of this body does not want this to happen, either.

One thing that has happened this week that is puzzling to me is all the difficulties we have had and the difficulties the chairman and I have had today in getting this bill up, and we have been essentially on the floor since 10 o'clock this morning attempting to do that, literally not leaving this area, and trying to get it passed and over to the House, and every one of the issues have not dealt with what we are trying to solve. There have been extraneous issues brought up by individual Members.

I want to close by saying what we set out to do was to solve a problem and restructure the industry. Even the financing issue is not important, relatively speaking, compared to a complete restructuring of the industry: separating the function of insurance from the regulatory function; placing the new agency for the regulation of S&L's under the Treasury Department; putting in new, tough, capital standards; dramatically increasing the statute of limitations in criminal and civil penalties to $1 million a day for those who steal from the American public and their depositors; and to put in new procedures across the board to attempt to make this a situation that will not happen again.

The core issues of this bill are the good parts of the bill. It really is a good bill. The President sent up a good bill. The Congress has strengthened it, particularly with the increased capital standards. We have lost sight of that this week, and I hope the House of Representatives would think tonight what they are doing.

The funding issue and some of the other extraneous issues that people do not like are unimportant compared to getting in a complete restructuring of the industry and making sure these people have to put up more of their own money. That is the best way to ensure they do a better job of it. They are a lot more careful with their own money than they are with someone else's. That is what we ought to be focusing on.

I hope the House of Representatives will, and this bill will go down to the President and be signed by next week so we can stop the hemorrhage and get on with it.

Mr. President, I am happy to report that we have achieved a compromise with the House on the issue of financing the S&L bailout. I did not sign the original conference report on the S&L bill because of my concerns over funding and I voted not to waive the Budget Act. With the compromise we have worked out with the House, I now support the conference report and intend to vote for its adoption.

What is more important, the President has today indicated his support of the revised conference report. If we adopt the conference report today, we can have this important legislation signed into law in the very near future.

The budget compromise in the bill is not all I hoped we could get, but I believe it is a reasonable deal and the best we are going to get under the circumstances. I would like to review the proposal briefly.

The compromise retains substantial elements of the Senate position and the administration's proposal. We have retained the private borrowing mechanism of REFCORP and have maintained Gramm-Rudman-Hollings rules intact for 1990 and 1991. We are not going to be in the position of altering the maximum deficit calculations and waiving sequestration requirements for the first time through this bill.

The compromise also involves a concession on the part of the Senate. It adds $20 billion to the 1989 budget deficit, compared to the $10 billion off-budget funding requirement in 1989 under the administration's original plan. This expanded use of Treasury funds, while unwelcome, is justified on two grounds.

First, the larger figure represents a reassessment by the administration and the FDIC of what can be used in the opening months of the rescue operation. In addition, the shift to direct Treasury funding is based on the assessment that it will be very difficult to create REFCORP and raise $10 to $20 billion in the short time remaining in this fiscal year.

I would only remind my colleagues that we have always known that any version of this legislation would require a 1989 budget waiver and we must face that fact here. We have not emerged unscathed but this compromise keeps the budget rules largely intact.

This is a bill that has the support of the President. I urge my colleagues to adopt this compromise. Further delay only increases the cost to the American taxpayer.

I would also like to take this opportunity to thank the hardworking Republican staff of the Banking Committee. Through the many long months since the President submitted the bill, the staff has worked countless hours, long into the night, and through weekends to ensure that we had a good bill to vote on today. Personal lives were sacrificed to produce this bill, and I am very grateful to the staff members and interns. Wayne Abernathy, Rob Ball, Brad Belt, Dan Berkland, Eric Boyack, Lynn Gee, Karen Jensen Marsden, Diane Mery, Patti Engebretson Mietla, Ray Natter, Ira Paull, Mary Dwyer Pembroke, Lamar Smith, Adam Spector, Paul Voltmer, and John Walsh.

The entire Banking Committee staff, Republican and Democratic, worked very well together through the entire process and I would like to express my appreciation to the majority staff for their work on the bill. In addition, I would like to recognize the work of the committee's front office staff. Chief Clerk Lory Breneman and her assistants Rachel Jacobson and Margarete Muskett have performed ably during the long process of hearings, markup, and the conference. Without the hard work and dedication of this fine staff, the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989 would not be before this body today.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN). Who yields time?

The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, we come this evening to an important chapter in this book. It is an evening on which the Senate will no doubt vote to accept the conference committee report, and we will await the action in the House of Representatives.

As indicated by the distinguished chairman and ranking member whose great and committed effort to this cause deserves our total applause and commendation, there are many basic issues raised in this bill. I would like to especially recognize the very solid work which has been done in terms of building a stronger capital base under this industry. Because, as our colleague from Utah has stated, it is exactly that strengthened capital base that will give us the greatest assurance that this total disaster will not be repeated.

However, Mr. President, I believe there are some very fundamental ways in which this legislation is deficient. One of those ways is in terms of basic honesty. Does this legislation address the true extent of the problem before the American people? And does it provide, at the least cost and the greatest rationality, a means of resolving that problem?

Mr. President, this chart illustrates, in the cluster of bars on the right side of the chart, what the administration's assessment is of the extent of this problem over the 30 years that the bonds that will be authorized by our action tonight are authorized to be sold. The total cost to the American taxpayers will be $176 billion. That figure is essentially arrived at by a subtraction process. By adding the total cost of the program, which is estimated to be $239 billion, and then subtracting what will be contributed toward its resolution by the Federal Home Loan Bank Boards and by the S&L industy itself.

I suggest that this chart is deficient in at least two principal manners. First, it is deficient in terms of stating what the true cost of the total program will be. To use one example, the last $50 billion of this $239 is to be the cost associated with closing those institutions which will be closed in the future. The balance of the costs are for institutions which have already been closed and for which we will be paying the cost of that closure over the years into the future.

That figure of $50 billion is arrived at by this rough mathematics. Those institutions, some 200 plus, have a total deposit base at risk of $400 billion. They have assets of $350 billion. The difference is the $50 billion which is included in this plan.

That sounds like it is straightforward mathematics that should represent the amount necessary to be included. So what is the problem? The problem is that there is an assumption that we will be able to realize 100 percent of that $350 billion which represents the assets of these institutions, which we contemplate going into some form of Government-assisted continuation or actual closure of business.

What has been the experience with the institutions that we already have taken in, in this financial fiasco of unprecedented proportions? The institutions that we have taken in to date have had an average asset recapture of approximately 60 percent. If that same 60-percent figure applies to the institutions that we contemplate taking in the future, we are not talking about a loss of $50 billion. We are talking about a loss of $140 billion in addition to the $50 billion.

If we are better in the future than we have been in the past, and could cut that, instead of a 60-percent asset value, if we could keep it at an 80-percent asset value, we would be adding $70 billion additional dollars to this program.

That is one basic element which we all need to understand, that we are working with numbers that are unlikely to be realized in the future.

The second basic premise of this accounting is how the costs are going to be allocated, as between the taxpayer and the industry. This chart, which assumes the industry is going to be able to pay $51 billion toward this rescue plan, is predicated among other things, on the assumption that the industry will experience a growth in deposits over the next 10 years of an average of 7.2. percent a year.

All of us know that, in fact, the industry has been shrinking over the past several months; that deposits have been leaving this industry, not coming into the industry at the 7.2-percent rate upon which this figure is predicated.

Assuming that the rate of deposit growth is a more realistic but in my opinion still very optimistic 5 percent over the next 10 years, that will reduce the industry contribution to $42 billion.

I believe, my colleagues, that it is this series of bar graphs that is much more likely to be the extent of the problem that we are facing: A diminished contribution by the industry, and a staggering $331 billion contribution by the American taxpayer from today through the year 2019, toward this problem. That assumes that the additional costs of this program will be only $25 billion more than the administration is currently assuming, which I consider to be an extremely conservative estimate of what the additional cost is likely to be.

Mr. RIEGLE. Will the Senator yield on that point on my time just briefly?

As he knows, I share his concern on the question as to whether or not the amounts here will be sufficient to meet this problem. I inserted in the RECORD yesterday—and I want to make reference to it now—two letters that I sent recently; one to the Treasury Secretary, Mr. Brady, the other to the FDIC Chairman, Mr. Seidman, raising precisely that question as to whether later information would have caused them to think that they might need a higher amount to finance this plan. They both responded in writing in detail saying that they felt confident the amounts being asked for by the administration were sufficient.

I still register my own concern about that, but those two letters, my letters to them and their responses, were placed in the RECORD yesterday. I will not do it again now, but I did want that reference to be at this point in the discussion in terms of the point the Senator from Florida makes.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. GRAHAM. I say to my dear friend from Michigan, I take no solace with the representations. Today is August 4, 1989. Three hundred sixty-seven days ago, on August 2, 1988, a gentleman appeared before the committee which you chair, the Senate Banking Committee. That gentleman was the Under Secretary of the Department of the Treasury, Mr. George Gould. Mr. Gould, speaking for the administration before the Banking Committee 367 days ago, made this statement:

> I urge this committee in the strongest possible terms to resist mounting pleas for an unnecessary budget-busting bailout of FSLIC.

If I could repeat that quotation:

> I urge this committee in the strongest possible terms to resist mounting pleas for an unnecessary budget-busting bailout of FSLIC.

I submit that, Mr. President, as the basis for my skepticism as to the representations that are now being made that we have come forward with a plan that will be the final solution to this period of economic ignominy for the United States.

Second, in addition to feeling that we have substantially understated the cost of this plan, I think that we have constructed now a financing mechanism which is going to make it much more difficult for us to deal with what I think are the almost inevitable next calls upon the American taxpayer to finance this measure. We are going to have a mixed bag of FICO bonds which were authorized 2 years ago to finance part of this disaster. We are going to have now some on-budget borrowing and we are going to have a new set of funds under REFCORP for off-budget borrowing.

Into this alphabet soup of financial shenanigans, much of which is designed to mask the true extent of its problem, we are now going to be, I predict with absolute certainty, faced with additional charges to the American taxpayer in order to deal with the full extent of this problem.

So I believe that this plan is deficient in the sense that it fails to meet one of the basic standards that should apply to any act of surgery or salvation, and that is let us deal with the patient once, and not have to have that patient to be wheeled back into the operating room time after time, particularly when this patient is going to have to be cut through with layers of scar tissue from previous failed attempts to resuscitate this crisis-laden industry.

Finally, Mr. President, I believe that we need in this generation to accept our responsibility. We have a financing plan that is going to put the costs of this to our children and our grandchildren. It is also going to be a financing plan which will cause all of our statements of fiscal conservatism and prudence at our efforts of regaining control of the American fiscal scene to be shattered.

What we are proposing to do is to take $20 billion and dump it into 1989 to inflate the amount of deficit this year since it will count toward next year's Gramm-Rudman target. I believe that that is an extremely dubious proposition in terms of finance and even a more dubious proposition in terms of facing with candor and honesty what our generation has inflicted upon the people of this Nation.

But instead, we are taking the route that says: "Let's look at what is least painful to us, what will most mask our indiscretions, and let's let our grandchildren pay for it."

Mr. President, this is not our proudest hour. I hope that when we come back, whether it is next week or next month, or certainly next year, to deal again with this issue, which we are leaving dangling from a shredded thread of less than fully honest and candid public policy, that the chapters that we will write in the future will be brighter ones than the ones we pen tonight.

Mr. President, yesterday during debate on H.R. 1278, the conference report on the Financial Institution Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989, Senator GRAMM of Texas referred to the Banking Committee's 1987 markup on prior legislation to recapitalize the FSLIC. He said that at the markup he attempted to increase from $7.5 to 15 billion the amount the committee authorized for the FSLIC recapitalization and that I had opposed him. He also said Senator GARN attempted to increase the $7.5 billion in the committee's bill to $10 billion, and that I had opposed that. I regret to have to say that these statements made by Senator GRAMM as to what happened at the March 1987 markup are not accurate. Let me explain:

The bill presented by the chairman at the markup gave the administration $7.5 billion to recapitalize the FSLIC.

The Banking Committee, in its March 1987 report stated why the committee chose not to give Treasury the $15 billion it originally requested. That report states:

The Treasury/FHLBB plan called for a borrowing authority of $15 billion with no near term limit on when that authority could be exercised despite the Treasury's own statements that probably no more than $2.5 billion could be borrowed in any one year.

The amendment offered by Senator GRAMM, which he said I voted against, actually stated that the Banking Committee provide $15 billion for the recapitalization of FSLIC, but that "no more than $7.5 billion could be expended in the first 2 years." That is the amendment I voted against. Senator GRAMM never sought a vote on an amendment to give the administration $15 billion with no limits.

The amendment offered by Senator GARN, that Senator GRAMM said I voted against, was to give the administration "10 billion not to exceed $3.5 billion a year." Senator GARN never offered an amendment to give the administration $10 billion without restrictions.

The amendment that I did vote for was the Sanford amendment which gave Treasury $7.5 billion for 2 years with a limit of $3.75 billion per year, and which further provided that the Congress should review the problem over the next 2 years before providing additional funds.

So in reality Senator GRAMM and I both favored giving the administration $7.5 billion over 2 years to deal with the FSLIC issue. Our disagreement was over whether the administration should have been given $7.5 billion more in 1987 to handle problems after the initial 2-year period, or whether it should come back to Congress and report on the matter before any decision was made. I favored clear congressional supervision.

What really caused these problems to get out of hand was not giving the administration less than $15 billion in 1987, but rather that in 1988 when Congress conducted oversight hearings administration and the Bank Board officials did not accurately portray what was going on.

In May 1988 Danny Wall, the Chairman of the Bank Board told the Banking Committee that the Board could deal with existing problems with the resources then available. He did not ask for any more resources from Congress.

Let me read an interesting exchange between Senator GRAMM and Mr. Wall from the transcript of that May 26, 1988 hearing:

Senator GRAMM. Danny, as you are aware, there have been a lot of people in front of this committee and a lot of talk around town from people with faint hearts and open palms about a taxpayer bailout.

I am committed to the idea that with enlightened public policy, we can avoid a taxpayer bailout.

Do you believe we can do that?

Mr. WALL. We believe that the numbers are such right now that barring any significant shift in our assumptions in the economy, generally, we are within striking distance of having dealt with all of the problems with the resources available.

On August 2, 1988, just over 1 year ago, Under Secretary Gould of the Treasury speaking for the administration told the Banking Committee:

I urge this committee in the strongest possible terms to resist mounting pleas for an unnecessary budget busting bailout at FSLIC.

The facts are that in March 1987 the Banking Committee gave the Treasury $7.5 billion for 2 years, just as Senator GRAMM proposed, and also decided to conduct closer oversight of the matter before authorizing more. The reason we are here today is not because we failed to adopt Senator GRAMM's amendment in our March 1987 markup, but rather that the administration in our subsequent oversight hearings was not honest with the Congress about the mounting losses at FSLIC necessitating a taxpayer bailout until after the November 1988 election was over.

SEQUESTRATION ISSUE

I do think Senator GRAMM should be reminded that at the same March 1987 markup about which he spoke yesterday, he resisted the committee's efforts to provide the bank and savings and loan regulatory agencies with the resources they needed to crack down on abuses in our financial institutions.

Bank regulators are paid by fees imposed on the financial institutions they regulate and therefore do not use taxpayer moneys to carry out their duties. Despite that fact, the Reagan administration applied the automatic budget cuts on agency expenditures mandated by the Gramm-Rudman Act to the bank regulatory agencies. In 1986 Senators Proxmire and GARN wrote to OBM and stated:

If these agencies are hamstrung by arbitrary limitations on their administrative expenses, they cannot take timely action to close or merge failing institutions with the result that the ultimate cost to the insurance fund administered by these agencies will be much higher. Surely the Congress did not intend this anomalous result when it enacted the Gramm-Rudman Hollings Act.

When, despite this letter, the Reagan administration refused to carry out the clear intent of Congress on this matter, Senator RIEGLE offered an amendment at the Banking Committee's March 1987 markup to mandate that the bank regulatory agencies be exempted from the provisions of the Gramm-Rudman law and the Anti-Deficiency Act. I supported that amendment in order to ensure that the bank and S&L regulatory authorities had the resources they needed to do their jobs. Senator GRAMM voted against that amendment. After the committee adopted the Riegle amendment, Senator GRAMM wrote to all his Senate colleagues about why it was a bad idea and why he would seek to remove the provision on the Senate floor.

Senator GRAMM, like the Reagan administration, took a penny-wise, dollar-foolish attitude on this matter. They failed to understand that insured financial institutions are ultimately playing with funds guaranteed by the taxpayers, and when they are not regulated properly the taxpayer bears the risk. Today's $50 billion American taxpayer bailout is a demonstration of that fact.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, first, let me associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague from Florida, Senator GRAHAM. I agree with his observations. I agree with his analysis. I agree with his conclusion.

Mr. President, I take this opportunity to express why earlier I said I felt profound opposition to what we are doing tonight. In one fell swoop, we are extending the debt limit by $70 billion and we are passing a $166 billion package to bail out the S&L industry financing it off budget, and all on voice votes.

It is truly make believe time in Washington, Mr. President. In 9 years, the national debt of this country has tripled from just over $900 billion to $2.8 trillion, and tonight we stack on another $70 billion. We have gone, in that same period, from being the largest creditor nation in the world—more countries owing us more money than any other country in the world—to being the largest debtor nation in the world, owing over $500 billion to other countries. And still it goes on.

It is true that the official deficit has been cut from over $220 billion in 1986 to a projected $100 billion in 1990, but we are doing it by raiding the trust funds, as previously described by my colleague from Florida, Senator GRAHAM—raid the Social Security trust fund, raid the highway trust fund, raid the airport trust fund. And tonight we come up with a new fraud and new sham—off-budget financing of the S&L bailout and forget Gramm-Rudman targets for 1989. Make believe, make believe, Mr. President, make believe the money is not being spent; make believe we are not adding to the debt; make believe.

Mr. President, what should we have done? I believe we should have put this expenditure on budget. Let us be honest with the American people. And I believe, Mr. President, that would have cost the taxpayers of America far less because then we would have allowed Treasury borrowing at lower interest rates to finance this bailout.

Mr. President, I believe we should have subjected the expenditures to the Gramm-Rudman limits.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, may we have order in the Senate? The Senator is making an important speech. He is entitled to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. CONRAD. I want to thank my colleague, the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. I want to thank my friend for the statement he is making and, if he will yield, I intend to vote against this bill. If it is a voice vote, I want it recorded here and now. Saying that, I compliment the manager and the ranking manager. I think they did the very best they could under extremely difficult circumstances. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. CONRAD. I want to associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia. I also have deep respect for the chairman of this committee and for the ranking member. I too, believe, that they dealt with an extremely difficult situation in which they tried their very best to get this handled in an appropriate way.

Mr. President, let me return to the reason I believe the Gramm-Rudman limits should have been adhered to. That would have forced some hard choices on this President and on this Congress. Instead, we have a compromise that is the worst of all options. Forget Gramm-Rudman for 1989 and shuffle it off budget for the future. We forget budget discipline and we adopt the administration's gimmick of off-budget financing.

Mr. President, this is a policy of duck and run. Duck and run from the greatest threat to our collective security, our economic vulnerability. How long can a great nation remain great when it engages in wholesale fraud of this dimension?

Mr. President, I fear for the future of our country. We could be taking a different direction tonight. We could be starting to face up to our problems. We could be calling on the American people to join us in an effort to move in a new direction. Mr. President, I profoundly regret that we are missing that opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CONRAD. I ask unanimous consent for 1 additional minute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I want to indicate tonight that this is the last time I will agree to a unanimous-consent agreement to allow a voice vote on an extension of the debt limit. Never again for this Senator, never again will I be a party to a unanimous-consent agreement to allow a voice vote on a debt limit extension, and I further want to say tonight, Mr. President, that when we face the long-term debt extension this fall that I, along with others, will present a plan to face up to these deficits squarely once and for all.

With that, I again want to state my respect for the chairman of the committee and for the others who have put this package together, but I cannot let this moment go by without again expressing my profound opposition to what we are doing tonight and the way we are doing it. I yield the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I believe I have 10 minutes assigned to me; is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. EXON. Yes, I yield.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I am concerned that this legislation will cause more harm than good. While I recognize the need by savings and loan depositors for this assistance, particularly in certain parts of our country, I question whether we can afford the price in its current form.

Last night, I voted with most of my colleagues on this side of the aisle against waiving the Budget Act in order to place $50 billion in new bonds on budget, but out of reach of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I believed then as I do now that to do so would have spelled the end for whatever shreds of fiscal discipline remain in this body. Such blatant disregard for the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings process and targets on which we and many in the business and financial communities have come to depend would surely spell a rocky road ahead.

Now we have been presented with a compromise which apparently has become acceptable to the administration. What has changed? What has changed is that the agreement before us now exploits the biggest loophole in the Budget Act. The authors of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings bill, in writing that legislation tried to take every possible congressional dodge that might be tried into account to ensure that the deficit targets would be met.

Unfortunately, the process still contains several avenues of escape. The one exploited here is that the deficit targets for any fiscal year only are binding until the beginning of that fiscal year on October 1. After that, anytime we breech the targets results not in a sequester of funds to bring us back down to the target, but just the possibility of a point of order under the Budget Act. And, as we have seen for much of this year, that can be easily waived with 60 votes in the Senate. It may not have happened that easily last night, but that was the exception rather than the rule.

Thus, our 1989 fiscal year budget will rise from $148 billion to $168 billion. Does anyone remember what the target was for 1989? I have not heard that amount mentioned at all tonight. Well, it was $136 billion; $136 billion deficit for fiscal year 1989. Instead, under this bill we will have exceeded that target by $32 billion for this year alone.

Mr. President, I do not think the compromise reached last night will cause more problems for us down the line than it seeks to solve. Not only will we continue to have a problem in the financial services industry as a result of the fraud, waste, and mismanagement; we may very well be imperiling the health of our economy.

I have also had a chance to reflect since the Senate passed this bill in April on its purpose and intention. I am worried that this legislation is setting a dangerous easy-to-follow precedent further down the line.

I have heard from a number of Virginians as to why the money needed for this savings and loan bailout must come from the public either through the taxpayers or the public debt.

Just last week for example, a gentleman from Glen Allen, VA, called my office to ask a very basic question: Why can't those who caused this mess be the ones to pay for cleaning it up? He, however, put it a little more basically, he said: "Why should the taxpayers have to bail out the crooks and people who were asleep at the switch?"

Earlier today we passed legislation requiring those responsible for oil spills to be held accountable for bearing the burden of cleaning them up. Why can we not do the same for the S&L industry?

We have all read the reviews of how our Nation's financial system got to this position. And there is no question that the savings and loan depositors across the country have a right to expect Congress to live up to the commitment behind the FSLIC, guaranteeing up to the first $100,000 of any deposit.

Mr. President, I regret we are tonight handling this legislation in this manner and without a recorded vote. It is my intention, subject to clarification by the managers and others during debate and explanation in full of the conferees' actions, to vote in opposition to this measure.

I ask unanimous consent the following article expressing some of my concerns be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INVESTORS HUNTING BARGAINS SEE BONANZA IN S&L BAILOUT

(By Jerry Knight)

Private investors with billions of dollars to spare are lining up to buy troubled savings and loan associations as soon as Congress completes work on the $157 billion S&L bailout bill.

Lawmakers will begin working out differences between the House and Senate versions of the measure this week, but already prospective buyers have arranged for financing and are targeting possible acquisitions among the hundreds of ailing S&Ls.

The new investors, including some familiar with the S&L business as former regulators, see the prospect of 20 percent returns or better in the environment that will be created by the bailout legislation. A smaller S&L industry will reduce competition and the government will take bad loans off the books of thrifts that it sells.

The potential buyers include major players on Wall Street and top level Washington veterans: former Cabinet members William E. Simon and Peter Peterson; former Federal Reserve Board governor Preston Martin; and former Federal Home Loan Bank Board officials Richard Pratt and Jamie Jackson. Merrill Lynch, Shearson Lehman Hutton, Oppenheimer and Co. and Salomon Brothers have raised funds for S&L acquisitions, and leveraged-buyout specialist Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Co. is anxious to join in the bidding.

Simon, who was the Treasury secretary in the Nixon and Ford administrations, and Martin are partners in ventures that already have acquired S&Ls with almost $10 billion in assets and are looking for associations valued at $2 billion or more.

Peterson, the Commerce secretary in the Nixon administration, has linked his Blackstone Group investment firm with Old Stone Capital and Salomon Brothers to raise $300 million to $600 million, which could be enough to buy S&Ls with assets of almost $20 billion.

Another big financing package is being put together by Wall Street investor Lewis Ranieri through a private partnership whose known members include the Prudential Insurance Co. and Westinghouse Corp.

Reigning as the nation's biggest dealmaker after its $24.5 billion purchase of RJR Nabisco Inc. KKR could easily raise the capital to buy many savings and loans.

There also are buyers interested in smaller associations, like Thrift Recap Partners, which is managed by National Capital Group of Washington. With $15 million raised through Oppenheimer, the partnership is looking to buy a few community thrifts with $80 million to $100 million in assets.

Even small investors are getting into the act through funds like Merrill Lynch's U.S. Thrift Opportunity Partners, which allows people to put as little as $2,000 from their individual retirement accounts into a $100 million fund whose managers include former bank board chairman Pratt. Two similar partnerships organized by Shearson Lehman Hutton have raised $415 million.

The bidders also include what one government official described as "people who never heard of savings and loans but think it's a way to make a quick buck."

The prospect of making a fast profit is pooh-poohed by the more experienced players such as Ranieri, who said: "I don't think you can reasonably expect to do that in this situation, certainly not in Texas" where many of the available S&Ls are located.

The investors generally agree that they are looking for a profit of 20 percent to 25 percent per year on their S&L purchases, but they expect to have to wait seven to 10 years to cash in on their investments.

Compared with the 8 percent interest rate on long-term government bonds, 20 percent a year sounds high. But Gerard Smith, a managing director of Salomon Brothers, said: "The people who put up money like this are not eleemosynary."

"The stock market in the last decade has yielded 16 to 18 percent after taxes," he said, "and when you add the risk and illiquidity factor, you need annual returns in the 20 to 25 percent range."

Taking over struggling S&Ls will be a risky business, even with the government picking up the tab for past losses. The S&L bill rein in wide-open investment rules that allowed S&Ls to invest in windmills, fast-food restaurants and high-risk junk bonds, and in the process will limit some investments that have been highly profitable. To make them pay for past sins, the measure also will sharply increase deposit insurance premiums for S&Ls, which will raise the cost of doing business and put thrifts at a competitive disadvantage with banks.

Philip Weintraub, president of National Capital Group, said his group's investment strategy is being shaped by the S&L bill as it moves through Congress. The group's original plan was to buy S&Ls that were short on capital, but not in enough trouble to need government help. His group now has determined that it may be safer to go after associations that have died and been resurrected by the government because the bad assets will have been removed.

None of the deals can be launched, however, until a congressional conference committee makes decisions on issues such as how much of their own money investors will have to put up, how soon banks will be allowed to buy healthy S&Ls and how much time marginal associations will have to meet tough new capital standards.

The bill's reforms should make the S&L business more attractive, said Preston Martin, a former bank board chairman as well as Fed member. He said the bill will shut down the S&L "cowboys" who were making high-risk, high-interest loans—knowing the government would pay for their mistakes. It will eliminate the failing associations that tried to stay afloat by paying exorbitant interest on deposits, which their competitors were forced to match.

Competition also will be reduced because a substantial number of failed S&Ls will simply go out of business because there will be no buyers for them, Martin said.

By the end of this year, say government officials and private investors, at least 200 to 300 S&Ls are likely to be sold. On the block will be 233 associations that have been taken over by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. (FDIC) in the last few months, a handful of others that are in the hands of the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corp. (FSLIC) and an unpredictable number of thrifts that are too weak to survive for long.

The transactions are expected to add up to even more than the $3 billion in private capital invested last year in 179 associations that were sold or merged by the FSLIC. Those associations got $38 billion in federal insurance payments, by the FSLIC's calculation, but congressional critics said the cost to the government will ultimately run far higher because of tax benefits and open-ended loan guarantees.

This year's S&L deals will be different than the ones done last year, because this time the government will have cash to spend as the result of Congress' replenishment of the depleted the FSLIC insurance fund. Without cash to cover past losses, the FSLIC last year was forced to sell S&Ls before they were brought back to health. Buyers were guaranteed a generous annual profit—for several years—on any S&L assets they bought.

Last year's S&L buyers also were allowed to deduct billions of dollars of past losses from their other income, a practice that both the House and Senate have voted to outlaw in the future. This time around, said FDIC officials, the government will try to avoid making open-ended loan guarantees. What the FDIC prefers to do when a bank fails, said spokesman Stephen Katsanos, is to write a check to cover past losses and then sell the operation to new investors who will be on their own as far as future profits or losses are concerned.

Buyers may not go for the idea of not being protected from future losses, warned several potential bidders, who asked not to be identified so their investment strategies would not become known to competitors. "Neither we nor anyone else coming in is going to take any risk on the old junk," said one likely bidder.

Most of the overdue loans and repossessed real estate from failed S&Ls will be transferred to the Resolution Trust Corp., a vast new bureaucracy that will be created by the S&L bailout bill to handle such problem assets. Managing property for RTC will be another multibillion-dollar business opportunity created by the S&L bailout bill, but it will be a different business than rebuilding failed associations.

Successful S&L restructurings will require two distinct skills: raising the money and putting together the deal to buy the association, and then turning the institution around. As a result, many of the bids are coming from teams, most often a Wall Street investment banker to raise the cash and a financial banker—or S&L manager—to run the business.

Among the teams is American First Limited Partnership, in which American First, an Omaha S&L company, is providing the management expertise and Shearson Lehman Hutton is raising the money through two publicly offered limited partnerships. The first partnership last year raised $120 million, of which about $100 million went to buy a $2 billion S&L in California. With $295 million raised from a second partnership offering, American First is looking for other acquisitions.

A similar venture brings together Salomon Brothers, the big investment banking firm, with the Blackstone Group, a New York investment firm whose partners include former Commerce secretary Peterson, and Old Stone Capital, an arm of a Rhode Island S&L holding company.

Because of banking laws preventing investment firms from controlling commercial banks, Salomon will own no more than 24.9 percent and the other partners will share the rest. The goal, said Smith of Salomon, is to invest $300 million to $400 million, which should be enough to buy S&Ls with assets of $10 billion to $13 billion.

Another major player is expected to be Oak Tree Capital, a Washington-based subsidiary of a California S&L. Headed by former bank board member Jamie Jackson, Oak Tree not only is a potential buyer of S&Ls, but is providing investment banking and advisory services to other buyers.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I too share concerns about the manner in which it has been handled; I will vote against this conference report.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. EXON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, the Democrats' clever plan to put the S&L bailout on budget was really a proposal to nationalize the savings and loan problem: to have the Treasury take title to all the bad assets of the failing thrifts, inventory them, and then sell them on the market in years to come just as they sell silver from the Government stockpiles.

They have called this honesty in budgeting and they say, "it's a taxpayers' problem. Let the taxpayer pay on budget."

The President's plan started with the idea that the thrift industry itself had to carry most of the burden. But the Government does have a responsibility to depositors in failing thrift institutions. The President's plan was focused on the problem and held the taxpayers responsible for the least cost.

The bad assets of failing thrifts would be purchased by a new private corporation, REFCO, which would be owned by the thrift industry, those that are still in business. The Government would help keep REFCO solvent by paying interest on the bonds it would issue to buy the bad assets of failing thrifts, but REFCO would be in the private sector. The bad assets—today in private hands—would stay in private hands.

The cost of the taxpayers would be only the annual subsidy for the interest payments on the REFCO bonds. This would be on budget.

Unfortunately, the Democrats won the propaganda war. Because everyone agreed the taxpayers would have to pay for the bad practices of some savings and loans, the Democrats were able to say Bush's plan to keep the solution mostly in the private sector looked like an off-budget bailout.

Since the private sector is always off budget—unless it is nationalized—the Democrats' call to nationalize the problem could be labeled putting it on budget.

The conference compromise is the worst of everything, unfortunately, because it has budget gimmick after gimmick in it; but in order to get new regulatory and supervision laws onto the books, to put the rest of the thrift industry on a sound capital standard and a strict supervisory and auditing system more like commercial banks have, we need to pass the S&L bill before the recess.

Balancing the good features with the bad features of the conference compromise, and considering the longer term consequences of trashing Gramm-Rudman by rejecting it, it is a disappointment to me that the Congress could not have done better, even though it is essential to stop the hemorrhage.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two articles be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLOPPY

(By Phil Gramm)

The on-budget/off-budget controversy in the savings and loan bailout bill is a fraud that threatens to unleash a cataclysmic recession.

That's a stark assessment, but does another description fit? Before we can discuss the ultimate results, let's define the terms of this debate.

Contrary to rhetoric emanating from some quarters on Capitol Hill, the administration plan has all Treasury obligations "on budget." Under the administration's plan, the savings and loan industry would be required to borrow $50 billion, repayable in 30 years.

At the same time, the industry would be required to use its own resources to purchase zero-coupon government bonds that will mature in 30 years with a value of $50 billion. The $50 billion in borrowing is a liability of the S&L industry, and it is backed 100 percent by the Treasury Bonds the industry has been required to purchase.

Treasury has no liability for the $50 billion; and there is no contingent liability for the Treasury, since the industry cannot default on its debt, due to the 100 percent collateralization. Yet opponents have dubbed this approach "off-budget."

The second part of the administration plan requires the Treasury to pay the annual interest charges and all of that will be counted as outlays of the Treasury, fully "on" budget.

Never in the history of the U.S. Treasury, under the First and Second Banks of the United States, or under the independent Treasury has such a transaction been regarded as "off-budget" financing. Not until now. Not until a modern public relations expert decided that "off-budget" would surely sound bad to the public, leading people to embrace the "on-budget" plan crafted by the House of Representatives.

Let's consider what you get "on-budget." The House's prized "on-budget" S&L bailout bill has the Treasury, not the S&L industry, borrowing the money. No question about it; the House approach is certainly "on" budget, since the $50 billion would be a Treasury liability and would send the deficit up by an additional $50 billion.

The House bill has a second part, too.

In the ultimate fiscal sham, the $50 billion borrowed by the Treasury would be counted as part of the deficit, but it would not count as part of the deficit when we measure to see if we are meeting the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction targets.

If not counting a $50 billion deficit as a deficit for the purpose of GRH is not "off-budget" financing than what is?

You have to wonder why proponents of the so-called "on-budget" financing approach of the House want to create a $50 billion federal liability for the taxpapers instead of for the S&L industry. The answer is that by creating a federal liability instead of a fully collateralized private liability in borrowing $50 billion, the discipline of GRH will be shredded.

And if we can create non-counting deficits for the S&L bailout, why not create non-counting deficits to deal with the war on drugs, or housing, or to clean up nuclear waste or to pay for child care?

In truth, the Treasury plan is the on-budget financing plan. Every dollar of federal liability and federal spending is on budget and fully counted for GRH deficit reduction calculations. Every private dollar required is fully collateralized and will never be a Treasury liability.

The off-budget vs. on-budget debate is a smokescreen to obscure the real issue: Will Congress destroy the only instrument of fiscal discipline the nation has possessed in the last quarter century? That discipline has cut the deficit in half since 1985 and has reduced the rate of growth of federal spending by half.

The S&L bailout will cost the taxpayers billions of dollars under the best of plans, but if the bailout is used as pretext to kill fiscal responsibility, the cost will be multiplied manyfold.

With the assistance of a strong and vibrant economy, and with the sacrifice of other alternative uses of the funds, we are capable of fulfilling our guarantee to depositors in the thrift industry.

But if the S&L bailout is used to kill fiscal restraint and with it our strong economy, who will bail out America?

S&L CLEANUP? DERAILING GRH LIMITS

(By Robert Dole)

As if the tab for the savings and loan mess weren't high enough already, members of the U.S. House of Representatives crafted a funding plan that could kill the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings deficit reduction law, the revolutionary savings measure that has already trimmed about $100 billion off the federal deficit since its enactment.

Once again, the losers will be the taxpayers in the version that came out of the House.

Taxpayers should know that there is a critical difference between the funding plan adopted in the House of Representatives and the one endorsed in the Senate and backed by the Bush administration. Both provide the troubled thrift industry with the cash necessary to start shutting down the country's troubled S&Ls. In both cases, the cash is backed by $50 billion in bonds.

The House version guts GRH and derails our efforts to reach a balanced budget by 1993.

The big spenders on Capitol Hill loathe GRH because it tells them that if they don't meet required budget limits, automatic across-the-board spending cuts will go into effect.

The House-backed funding plan sounds good. Its proponents claim that by placing the $50 billion bond issue "on budget," they are being honest with the American people and saving them money at the same time. They also say that, by moving some of the costs of its funding plan "off budget," the administration is trying to shirk some of the responsibility for the S&L mess.

The administration plan does move some costs off budget. The basis for this decision is a fundamental distinction between payments from the Treasury and those made by the thrift industry. The administration plan counts every dollar that the U.S. government spends on the bonds in the federal budget and holds every dollar paid by the S&L industry off the budget.

This is an honest approach, because all of the on-budget items will count toward the calculation of the deficit under the GRH law. There is no exemption from GRH, not this year, not next year, not any year.

As an additional benefit, this funding plan locks the S&L industry into paying its fair share of the costs of the crisis, now, and in the future.

The so-called "on-budget" plan that originated in the House Ways and Means Committee was adopted by members of the House and Senate conference, and passed the full House, guts the GRH law with a multibillion-dollar exemption from the calculation of the deficit. Those who back the House plan argue that this is a one-time exemption, but don't believe it. This is a direct frontal assault on budget discipline in the short and long term. Recognizing this, President Bush has announced his intention to veto the S&L package if it contains the House funding plan.

The important issue here is the precedent. If we allow one exemption, we open the floodgates for exemptions for a host of big-ticket items—catastrophic health insurance, nuclear waste disposal, big government programs and the usual menu of pork-barrel projects members dream up.

Removing this statutory budget discipline can only result in higher spending, higher taxes and higher interest rates.

Backers of the House funding plan claim that their proposal minimizes the taxpayer cost of the S&L bailout. But, if savings were the real issue, the House leadership would not have dragged the S&L bill through a complex maze of congressional committees (five in all) for four months while the losses in the industry piled up at the rate of $20 million a day before finally bringing the bill to the House floor for a vote.

The fact that the House voted to stick a $150 million-a-year housing subsidy program—paid for with industry funds rather than using that same money to reduce taxpayer costs—in the original House bill is further evidence that cost containment was not the driving force behind the "on-budget" plan.

Those who supported the House funding set the stage for a tough fight from Senate Republicans. Sen. Phil Gramm, Texas Republican, has circulated a letter signed by 41 senators opposing the GRH exemption. Under the Senate rules, a 60-vote budget waiver is required for legislation containing a GRH exemption to pass the full Senate.

Those who back the "on-budget" plan have been able to control the debate on this issue by narrowing their focus on costs to this one bill. Their proposal promises nominal savings on borrowing costs, but these alleged savings are nothing but loose change when compared to the price tag for unbridled congressional spending under an impotent GRH act.

Mr. EXON. I am pleased to yield to my colleague from the State of Texas for the same purpose.

Mr. BENTSEN. I thank my distinguished friend from Nebraska and acknowledge his long conviction and work on trying to eliminate this budget deficit, but I particularly want to thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota who just made a most eloquent speech. I hope the sets were turned on all over the Capitol because he has made a major contribution.

He is a man dedicated and sincere in the effort of seeing this deficit is reduced. When we talk about the loss of savings in this country, the greatest savings we could have is getting rid of that kind of a deficit. If we are going to be competitive in the way of having capital that costs us the same rates it does the Japanese or the West Germans, then the most significant step we can make is to reduce this deficit.

If you are manufacturing widgets or any kind of product and your cost of capital is half of what your competitor's is, he is going to have a very difficult time staying in the ball game. So this problem affects not just the budget deficit but also the trade deficit and I think the competitive future of our country. I congratulate the Senator on his forceful speech.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, if I might just have 30 seconds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield? The Senator from North Dakota is asking the Senator from Nebraska to yield.

Mr. EXON. I will be happy to yield. I assume this will not be charged to the time allotted to the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has yielded to previous Senators.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, with all due respect, I must say I will not yield any further. I did not realize it would be taken away from my time.

Mr. CONRAD. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to give back to the Senator from Nebraska the time that he has yielded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. EXON. I thank my friend from North Dakota. Mr. President, there are some good reasons why the Senate should support the S&L bailout bill.

First, it is evident that the Committee on Banking, under the able leadership of Senator RIEGLE of Michigan and the ranking minority member, Senator GARN of Utah have done a workmanlike job under the most difficult of circumstances.

Second, it is clear that the Congress and the President have been successful in sweeping this calamity under the rug for far too long and that the responsibility of the Government under the law must be fulfilled if the guarantees to depositors under the law are to be kept, which underpins the whole financial system in America.

Third, it is my view that there are some good features in the legislation that begin to correct the problem to some extent. There is also merit to the argument that we must do something to stop the hemorrhaging that is currently going on that is causing a further loss of about $20 million a day since, at present, the Government officials responsible do not have funds to move aggressively to close and merge the more seriously insolvent savings and loans around the country, with a major part of them in Texas and California.

Having said all of that, Mr. President, I cannot in good conscience vote to saddle this conservatively estimated expenditure of $150 billion on the taxpayer because of the following reasons, among others:

First, the debate and vote on the Senate floor last evening convinced me beyond any doubt that there is continuing a grand scheme to fool the taxpayers as to the costs of this bailout. The bottom line is that with this latest smoke and mirrors approach the administration has successfully created a new gimmick to pass along our excesses in spending over receipts to succeeding generations with an ingenious, but nonetheless irresponsible, procedure to create bonded indebtedness that is off budget.

Under this procedure, which has been invented out of whole cloth and about to be approved, we have opened up the convenient avenue of shifting to bonded debt to cover our irresponsible financial policies. It should be considered a clever move to further escape coming to realistic grips with the problem and put this over until after another election. The term "tax and tax, spend and spend, elect and elect" has been advanced and delicately refined by two successive Republican administrations, first to "borrow and borrow, spend and spend, elect and elect" to the brand new irresponsible brainstorm of "bond and bond, spend and spend, elect and elect." I am weary, very weary, of reading lips that drip, if not with outright deceit, certainly with insincerity as far as fiscal responsibility is concerned. All this might be applauded by a majority of Americans of voting age since they need not be bothered with it all for now.

If Americans of nonvoting age knew of the debacle facing their generation, they would be lobbying their elders furiously to call a halt to all of this fiscal madness.

This then is the primary reason this Senator will not support the measure, but there are others.

Second, the measure is lacking the establishment of a board of experts to parcel out the funds in a responsible manner. This was suggested by my colleague Senator KERREY of Nebraska and I cosponsored an amendment that was turned aside by those who are overanxious to please the administration.

Third, this measure continues in employment the current Chairman of the Federal Home Loan Bank Board who has overseen the demise of our S&L industry and sat by while this mess exaggerated to monstrous proportions. Only last fall, just before the elections, this individual assured the Budget Committee that we were facing only a $50 billion shortfall in the insurance fund. He was, obviously, terribly wrong then and, all but forgotten, has been the total breakdown of the regulatory procedures of the Government.

I blame no one individual for this mess, but it is beyond good reason why we should keep in place the one official who helped supervise the financial disaster.

Fourth, I am fearful that we have addressed only the tip of the iceberg in this whole affair. Relatively soon the same people will be back with the same story requiring additional billions of taxpayer funding, but again with the creation of the bonding mechanism, it will be "easier" to just take care of it by selling more bonds.

There are other shortcomings with the legislation and the process that got us to this point. Suffice it to say, I am not persuaded to vote for this legislation that has been aptly described by senior Banking Committee members as a "turkey." I like turkeys generally, but not this kind that has a foul taste to it.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. GARN. I yield 4 minutes to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, we are about to vote on what is loosely described as a "compromise" on the funding plan for the S&L bailout bill. Unfortunately, thanks to partisan posturing by Members of the Democratically controlled Congress, this represents only a political compromise.

Putting $20 billion on this year's budget, of which only 7 weeks remain, not only compromises Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, but debases it. Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is the best thing Congress has going for budgetary discipline. It's our last vestige of hope of ever balancing the Federal budget.

It seems to me that the more Budget Act waivers are passed by the Congress, the easier it will be to eventually ignore Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. I also wonder if there is an insidious notion to swell the budget deficit to pressure President Bush to support tax increases.

We owe it to our constituents to uphold the Budget Deficit Reductions Act. Sneaking $20 billion into the last few weeks of the 1989 fiscal year, as this "compromise" would do, is not a suitable way to "make good" on the public trust.

More than 4 months ago, in February, President Bush sent to Congress the best-that-could-be-hoped-for resolution to the thrift crisis. He challenged Congress to send the finished legislation back to him by the first of April.

Instead, the Democratic leadership struggled to put their own mark on the thrift plan. They tampered with capital and they tampered with the name of the new deposit insurance corporation. They even added some housing and consumer provisions to the bill. Try as they might, the bill is still referred to as the "administration's plan."

The one part of the plan that emerged from the Democrats' conference report that is distinctly different from the President, is the on-budget financing plan. At the cost of $20 million a day, the Democrats in essence spent well over $2 billion trying to find a way to put their own mark on the thrift bail out plan.

Yet the Democratic Congress dares to complain that the administration's funding plan would have added a relatively small $150 million a year.

We're told that the Democrats want to put the S&L plan on-budget in order to be more honest, to let the American public realize just how big our budget problems are.

As if they don't know. The American public considers the budget deficit the biggest problem facing our Nation. Every taxpayer in America already knows that.

I know that the so-called compromise funds the remaining $30 billion off-budget in the subsequent fiscal years. This is necessary to keep a close eye on the Resolution Funding Corporation and to resist the influence of lobbyists wanting to get their hands on its capital.

I also know that the President supports this compromise. The President is more patient than I am.

It may seem that he stole the thunder from the Democratically controlled Congress, which not only was unable to devise its own plan to resolve the thrift problems, but also failed miserably in its 1987 attempt to pass reform legislation.

No; I am not as patient as is President Bush. With this compromise funding plan, the President has again demonstrated his willingness to cooperate with the Democratic Congress. He promised a kinder, gentler approach to Congress, and this is further evidence of it. Yet, all he gets is a kick in the teeth.

For the average politician, the embattled Lucas nomination would have been the last straw. But the President again stretches out an olive branch—agreeing to a compromise with the warring Democratic Party.

While I appreciate and respect the position of my President, my vote is one in opposition to the petty political barbs of a jealous Congress, a Congress that has been unable to deal with the problems of the thrift industry on its own or to accept the credit given the Republican administration for the plan which will be enacted.

Mr. President, I do not support this compromise. I admire the President for going that extra mile to satisfy the Democratic game players, but this is one game we can do without.

I would like to proceed for a few minutes to recap how I think we came into this mess.

I remember when Danny Wall came before the Senate Budget Committee last September. I believe it was in his prepared remarks that he estimated the costs of this problem at $12 billion. Two hours later, at the end of that meeting, he told the Budget Committee that the thrift crisis had become a $30 billion problem. Later in the fall, newspapers reported new estimates that the S&L bailout would be a $55 billion problem. In January of this year, with the start of this new Congress, the newspapers again upped the costs to $90 billion. When the President presented his plan to Congress, the bailout was a $126 billion problem. The number we hear most often now is $155 billion, a conservative estimate. Some estimates go up to $250 billion.

I will vote against this bill because I have not heard anyone say that we are done with this problem. Instead, I have heard everyone say that this issue will be revisited a few months down the road. Even persons intimately involved in the discussions assume that we will revisit this problem.

It started in the early 1980's when we gave more authority to the savings and loans without concomitant regulations or enhanced capital requirements. This problem was exacerbated when Congress didn't fulfill its responsibility the first time around. It was my expectation, during debate on the 1987 legislation that the problem with FSLIC would be resolved. Here we are, in 1989, and no one denies that we didn't do the job right last time. I am voting "no" because I am embarrassed that the Congress of the United States cannot come up with a solution to this problem. This is the case even in the 20th century, with all the research capabilities we have at hand for estimates and forecasting.

So I oppose this conference report. I do not want to have to explain to my constituents why I supported an unfinished job. I am a little embarrassed now, to have to explain that we are back at it again after twice previously in this decade making mistakes.

I yield the floor and the remainder of my time.

Mr. CONRAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CONRAD. I ask to be recorded as voting no on this bill even though it is by voice vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. BOND addressed the Chair.

Mr. GARN. I yield 2 minutes to the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, I rise in support of the pending legislation. I wish we did not have to approve this legislation, but by voting for this conference report, we will ensure that the S&L cleanup begins promptly. It is an attempt to right a system gone awry and begin the immense task of liquidating the hopelessly insolvent thrifts and disposing of their assets. We need to close this sorry chapter in our financial history.

By and large, this is a tougher bill than the legislation we passed in April. It sets tougher capital standards; it sets more limits on which activities thrifts can conduct with federally insured deposits; it imposes much larger criminal penalties for financial fraud. I am particularly pleased with the fraud penalties—I introduced bills in the 100th and 101st Congresses which toughened the penalties on those who have robbed and looted savings and loans and I am delighted to have similar provisions included in this package. These reforms should fulfill our promise of "never again."

The administration and the Banking Committee wrestled with many complex and unanswerable questions in fashioning this package. I don't know if we have done enough to attract capital to the thrift industry. The provisions making it easier for bank holding companies to acquire thrifts are a small but positive step. For example, this legislation allows bank holding companies to use a common name and logo for their bank and thrift subsidiaries. We're going to need buyers for these sick thrifts if we are to keep the cost of the bailout down.

This bill is the best Congress and the administration can come up with at this time. As Fed Chairman Greenspan noted in his testimony before the committee, it may be necessary to do a midcourse correction and change some provisions of this bill as we see how it all works out in practice. What is important, however, is to begin the process of resolving the insolvencies and restoring sound regulation to the S&L industry as soon as possible.

The Banking Committee will have an immense task fulfilling its oversight responsibilities in monitoring the RTC's disposition of assets from failed thrifts—the biggest asset sale in history. I am sure that I speak for many of my Banking Committee colleagues when I say that I will aggressively pursue any signs of conflicts of interest as the RTC sells these empty condominiums and half finished hotels. Congress cannot let another HUD scandal develop under our noses.

We will also be watching all of the regulators' use of their new supervision and enforcement powers and the new Office of Savings Associations' implementation of tougher capital standards. In this legislation, we have granted the FDIC sweeping regulatory authority and I do have confidence in their ability and professionalism, but it will be important for the Banking Committee to monitor the FDIC's use of its broad authority.

We can't promise the American public that this legislation will work perfectly. I can promise, however, that if this legislation does not pass, the Federal Government will have to break the promise that was made to Americans 50 years ago that their deposits were insured. We cannot break that promise and I encourage my colleagues to vote for the bill.

Mr. President I wish to summarize one or two points that I think are very important. As a member of the Banking Committee, we have had to look at this problem. There are some of us who recognized that the problem, back when I first looked at it in 1987, was a large problem. We tried to get $15 billion then and there were those who said, "We don't need that much." And there is a lot of argument about precisely how much we do need, and none of us, none of us, can give the exact figure.

The fact that we have not been perfect in the past ought to be self-evident to everyone, but Alan Greenspan, when he came before our committee, said, no, nobody can give a precise answer but one thing we can tell you for sure is that the longer you go without doing something about it, the worse the problem is going to get.

To those who say we vote no, and I obviously respect their right, their ability, and their judgment in doing so, I would only say that perhaps they can come forward with a better plan. Because this is a problem that will not go away. The savings of millions of Americans which are invested in the thrift industry are at risk unless we do something. This is not a perfect compromise. I would like to see the funding different. I want to make sure that the savings and loan industry does not get back the money they put in. With that reservation, I say we had best do something because we are losing $10 million to $15 million to $20 million a day by not shutting down the sick thrifts. All those who want to vote no can do so but please, prey tell, come forward with a better plan. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, could I have 5 seconds?

Mr. RIEGLE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORD. I say to my friend from Missouri, we had a better plan last night and it was voted down.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, if I may.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate the comments made by various Members, and I certainly understand the feelings and the perspectives that have been stated here tonight.

I want to make two or three comments about the legislation that we are facing. When we all get elected we have a responsibility to act and that is why we run; these comes with the election having to address these issues. There is no question but what this is a most difficult one, and certainly my colleagues on the Banking Committee on both sides who have lived with this restructuring legislation for the last 6 months understand that I think perhaps better than anyone else.

I would say importantly in behalf of this legislation that there is a massive restructuring that takes place under this law if it is enacted. There are major reforms. We greatly strengthen the capital standards. There will be no more abuse of State powers which has led, I think, importantly, to a very large part of the losses we have seen in the country. Seventy percent of the losses across the entire country last year occurred in just two States.

There will not be any more junk bond purchases undertaken by savings and loan institutions, not that those were the cause of the collapse that we have seen today, but there is a risk in the future. And many of us felt that there ought not to be Government-insured deposits used for that purpose.

There are much tougher criminal penalties in this bill. Anybody who tries the things that happened in the past again is going to go to jail for 20 years. The fines are greatly increased. We give the Justice Department $75 million a year for each of the next 3 years to track down the people who defrauded the system and made off with the money, to not only put them into jail but to recover the money in every instance where we can.

We separate out the insurance fund. We insist that the industry itself pay every dime that we feel it can afford to pay without destroying the industry to pay for the recovery, and avoid the problems that have accumulated in the past.

We have tried in every way to structure in this bill the reforms that need to be undertaken, and it is essential that they be put into place because if they are not enacted then the system will carry on exactly as it is today.

So it is all well and good not to like this legislation. I do not think it is perfect, and there are parts of it that I do not like. But the notion that leaving the system the way it is, is a better answer, is not a better answer. The reforms in this legislation are manifest. That is why the editorial opinion that has come in from around the country—the New York Times, the Washington Post, other major detached financial experts—say this is a solid package. And it goes directly at the problems.

I can tell you this: If there are Members here who do not like it, there are special interests outside interested in this legislation that like it even less because they did not get their way in this package. This package is a strong package. It follows the design in the architectural structure of what the Bush administration asked for. This is the Bush plan. We have strengthened it in certain important respects; State powers being one of those, junk bonds being another. But this is essentially the Bush plan with the additional safeguards that we have been able to add.

It will make a big difference, and it will stop the losses that are out there today. To the question, "Is there enough money here?" I have my doubts about that. That is why I wrote the letters to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Chairman of the FDIC. They have given us their assurances. I still have the concerns. I have the concerns that have been expressed by my other colleagues. But we cannot see into the future. We have to operate with what we have to work with today and within the miserable constraints imposed upon us by this problem.

I think, given that reality, this is a solid package. It is needed in the public interest. It needs to be enacted, and the reforms need to be put into place now and the losses stopped now, cutting off some of the improper practices that are taking place even this very day.

So it is one thing to find defects in this package. It is another thing to say it is better, to vote it down and to let the current practices continue on for however long they would into the future.

We have a responsibility to act and the time to act is now. We have taken 6 months to build this legislation. It is the best legislation that could be crafted under these circumstances. The fact of the matter is that seal on the window of Federal Deposit Insurance says that this country stands behind that insurance system.

There was a regulatory failure. There was a catastrophe that rivals the worst things we saw in the 1930's. But this legislation fixes it. We have an obligation to fix it. It is not a pleasant task. It is a most unpleasant task.

But I will tell you this: it will not happen again, not the way it happened this last time if this legislation is enacted because we meet every major problem that we have been able to identify. I certify that, as I stand here now with respect to the basic reforms because we have written them into this bill. That is why a lot of the people who got into the trouble in the industry do not like this legislation because it is too tough. It is too tough as it should be for reasons. That is why it needs to be enacted tonight, in this Chamber, and in the other Chamber. We have to get the President's signature on it before the losses go even higher.

Do I like everything about it? No, I do not. It is the product of compromise. I do not like the financing formula. I must say we did improve it last night. We improved it to the tune of $20 billion on the budget with direct financing, and that saves $2 billion for the American taxpayers. That is something other speakers have mentioned tonight. It is something I feel passionately about. I would like to say it is fine. We could not get the whole five. But within the constraints we have had to work, we have a package here that the public interest requires. That is the hard fact.

Oh, I hope we will face this problem head-on, get this legislation enacted, and go on and put these reforms in place.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GARN addressed the Chairm.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. GARN. I just say I wholeheartedly agree with the chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. I opened my remarks in the same vein. He has done it much more articulately and eloquently. But to those who would carp at this point about the financing plan, he has adequately laid out what we tried to accomplish in that area with what we had. To those who would talk about the size of the problem, I will not take the time.

A number of my colleagues have suggested that the size of the problem is greater than the estimates of the administration and the FDIC. They wring their hands now and claim that we may be very sorry in the future if we have to revisit this issue because we did not provide enough money.

Let me set the record straight. Not one Senator offered an amendment either in committee, on the Senate floor, or in conference to provide more money to resolve this problem. Yet the bill passed the committee unanimously and passed the Senate overwhelmingly.

Moreover, the committee report of the Senate Banking Committee made no serious suggestion that more funds should be provided. Finally, the Banking Committee specifically voted to cap the amount of funds that could be provided for this problem.

So let us face facts. If Senators are so concerned about underestimates of the size of the problem, where were they when the issue was being debated and voted on? I think it is wrong to raise questions now, and I urge my colleagues to stand by their previous votes.

It may be that it is not enough. It may be it is too much. I do not know the likelihood. It probably is not in the future. But that will be determined, like Alan Greenspan said. The only way you can determine that is if you can tell me what the prime rate will be every month for the next 30 years. If the interest rate is good, the economy is stable, then it will be adequate. If it is not, we will have to come back and revisit this. But that does not mean we should not do it now.

We must pass this now tonight, because those who want to save $3 billion from a different financing method, in 3 months we will lose another $3 billion. We have lost $6 billion while we have been talking about this plan. If there is anything that should be said tonight, pass it tonight, stop the hemorrhaging.

I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. How much time remains? I may not want it all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senator GARN controls 3 minutes.

A REAL CRISIS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the crisis in the savings and loan industry has been brewing for a long time. It did not sneak up on anyone.

The real question the American people should be asking is "How did this problem ever get this large?"

Americans have a right to know what actions the administration and the Congress took once they recognized the problems in the savings and loan industry.

1986

The Treasury Department under President Reagan identified the problem early. In 1986, the Treasury and the GAO estimated that this was approximately a $30 billion problem, $15 billion in FSLIC premiums were expected over 3 to 5 years, but additional financing was needed.

In March, the Treasury proposed all additional $15 billion recapitalization to cover the difference. Their plan would have made the industry pick up the tab for the additional financing.

As it turns out, $15 billion may not have been enough to solve the problem entirely, but, if Congress had acted swiftly on Treasury's recommendations, the S&L industry would certainly be in better shape than it is today.

CONGRESSIONAL DELAYS

But, Congress did not act quickly. In 1986, Senator JAKE GARN, then chairman of the Senate Banking Committee, pushed a clean FSLIC recapitalization bill through the Senate. The House also passed a $15 billion package, but the House version contained a number of controversial housing provisions. Certain influential House Members stalled action on the bill by refusing to compromise on the housing provisions, and the bill died at the end of the 99th Congress.

In 1987, a similar situation occurred. The Senate passed a recap plan, but the thrift industry and certain Members of the House pushed for a much smaller $5 billion package, which, incidentally, contained a number of regulatory forebearances, before finally agreeing in August 1987 to provide FSLIC with $10.8 billion in revenues over 3 years. The funding was provided through two sources: Increased FSLIC borrowing backed up by the retained earnings of the Home Loan Bank Board System and a special FSLIC premium assessment paid by member institutions.

In addition to stalling action in this issue, Congress opted to grant regulatory forebearances for the S&L industry at virtually every stage in the process. The hope was that growth in the industry would make the problem go away. To put it mildly, that strategy backfired. Instead of shrinking, the problem grew by leaps and bounds.

The American people have a right to criticize the House, the Senate, the Reagan administration, the regulators, and the industry for failing to contain a problem that will now cost roughly $166 billion over the next 10 years. The fact is that continual delay and regulatory forebearances for the industry will cost the American taxpayers tens of billions of dollars.

COSTS MOUNTED

Because the savings and loan deposit insurance fund lacked the money necessary to shut down troubled thrifts, many of these so-called zombie institutions were allowed to remain open and continue generating losses. Their activity is the main reason cost estimates for the S&L mess have skyrocketed.

The simple fact is that the managers of insolvent thrift institutions are not financially liable for their losses. As a result, many of the zombie thrifts pursue increasingly risky investments in the hopes that they may be able to earn their way back to solvency. They are, in effect, encouraged to gamble with other people's money without exposing themselves to any risk.

The problem is that most of these investments do not pay off; they simply add to the debt in the system. This increase is compounded by the fact that the zombie thrifts bid up the cost of funds to their solvent competitors, placing an added strain on the local financial services sector.

PRESIDENTIAL INITIATIVE

Within days of his inauguration, President George Bush took the initiative in dealing with this crisis by introducing a comprehensive thrift reform proposal. On February 9, the President gave Congress 45 days to complete action on this legislation.

Today is day No. 176, and we still do not have a bill ready for the President's signature. With industry losses piling up at the rate of $20 million per day, that delay alone has increased the cost of the problem by more than $3.5 billion since the President announced his plan. In my view, further delay is not an acceptable alternative.

The Senate moved quickly, passing a bill back in April. In contrast, the House dragged the legislation through a complex maze of congressional committees—five in all—before finally bringing the bill to the floor for a vote in mid-June.

And what is the end result of these delays? A bill that bears a remarkable resemblance to the President's original proposal.

CHANGING ESTIMATES

The American people have been bombarded with estimates of the cost of the S&L mess. But, it is difficult to get a handle on the size of the problem when the figures keep changing—$26, $50, $100, $126, $157, $166, $250, $285, $400 billion—the sheer size of these numbers is mind-numbing. I have seen a variety of estimates, but the fact remains that we still do not know how big the hole in the industry is.

Part of the problem is that the numbers we see floating around are only estimates. Measuring the size of the FSLIC deficit with any degree of precision would be a monumental undertaking. It would involve going to each institution and examining every single loan on its books. The costs of such a study would be prohibitive, and it would only be accurate for a very short period. The truth is that the actual number will remain unknown until we complete the process; until then we must rely on estimates.

HUGE NUMBERS

It is difficult to comprehend the size of this problem. Huge numbers have been tossed around for so long that it is hard to keep a proper perspective on how large this problem really is. If you took 1 billion dollars' worth of $100 bills and put them in a pile, the pile would weigh 10 tons. If you laid the bills end to end, the line would stretch more than 986 miles. If you include interest costs, we are talking about a problem that could cost $250 billion over the next 30 years.

THE RESOLUTION TRUST CORPORATION

The S&L bill overhauls the regulatory structure that oversees the thrift industry and provides a funding mechanism to pay for case resolutions over the next few years, but it leaves some major questions unanswered.

The Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC] faces an unprecedented task. When this legislation is enacted, troubled savings and loans with roughly 400 billion dollars' worth of assets will come under the jurisdiction of the RTC. Senator PHIL GRAMM has stated, and I quote—"The Government has not seen this much real estate since the Louisiana Purchase"—end quote. He is not kidding.

One of my biggest concerns throughout this process has been how the RTC plans to dispose of these assets. The returns on this property will have a tremendous impact on the final cost of the S&L crisis.

Because of the volume of assets, involved, RTC actions will affect property values in local and regional markets. Regional considerations are obviously important, but if we are really concerned about maximizing the return on these assets and minimizing the cost to the taxpayer of the crisis, then I believe that those overseeing the RTC should focus on a workable long-term strategy at the national level to guide the RTC in its day-to-day operations.

In my view, tapping the expertise in the private sector can only help in this effort. I have discussed this issue at some length with Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady, and I am pleased that the administration, the House, and the Senate have agreed to include a national advisory board selected to work with the Treasury Secretary, the Federal Reserve Chairman, the HUD Secretary and the other members of the RTC Oversight Board on this issue.

CASE RESOLUTIONS

The Treasury Secretary has assured me that the Treasury Department, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, and the FDIC have been working diligently so that, and I quote—"We will be able to hit the ground running when this legislation is enacted"—end quote.

Right now, it is unclear that FDIC and RTC are ready to move or that they would do anything differently in working through its caseload of troubled thrifts than the FSLIC would have done with more cash. Again, I think a long-term strategy is needed to guide this process so that we don't have another "end-of-year closeout" in December. Real solutions are required.

STATE-CHARTERED THRIFTS

In the 1980's, a number of States chose to deregulate their own State-chartered thrift industry. In many cases, the States decided to proceed much more quickly with deregulation than the Federal Government.

The Federal Government placed strict limits on the percentage of assets a thrift could invest in commercial ventures and real estate development; the safety and soundness of the industry was their obvious concern. In spite of these reservations, many States—particularly, Texas, California, and Florida—decided to increase those limits dramatically and, in some cases, even remove them.

Increasing the limits on direct commercial and real estate investment increases potential earnings for State thrifts, but potential losses also rise, increasing the risk to the safety and soundness of the S&L industry.

A number of factors contributed to the problems in the Southwest, but look where the dollars are going. If you get right down to it, one could argue that this is a Texas-California relief bill. Last year, Texas had 29 of the Nation's 50 sickest thrifts, and California had 6 of the worst cases in the top 40. As of May 31, 9 of the 15 S&L's reporting losses in my home State of Kansas had significant losses resulting from investments and loans secured by Texas real estate. The other six troubled Kansas institutions reported significant losses resulting from investments backed by real estate in Oklahoma and Colorado.

Direct investments by State-chartered thrifts in risky ventures have played a part in this crisis. Because of the risk these institutions pose to Federal Deposit Insurance funds and ultimately the taxpayer, I am pleased that this legislation contains some limitations on the activities of State-chartered thrifts.

TOUGH CAPITAL

Tough new capital standards are perhaps the most important provisions in this bill. I want to commend the House and Senate conferees for their work in this area. Requiring the thrift industry to put up more capital is important because capital acts as a buffer that protects the Federal Deposit Insurance Fund from losses. Unfortunately, accounting gimmicks have allowed those in the industry to treat a number of intangible assets as capital. Real capital is needed to ensure that this crisis will never occur again.

WE'LL BE BACK

This is a major piece of legislation. There is no doubt in my mind that Congress will be revisiting this issue over the next few years.

In the meantime, I urge Chairman RIEGLE, Senator GARN, and each Senator on the Banking Committee to keep a watchful eye on this situation, and let us know if further changes are needed.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, we cannot afford further losses in the S&L industry. The price tag on this mess continue to grow at the rate of $20 million per day. As I said before, further delay is an unacceptable alternative.

President Bush sent a letter to the House and Senate leadership earlier today. The President said, "Final passage remains critical to the stability and solvency of our financial system."

Despite my reservations, I believe that there are times to protest and times to govern. In my view, this is a time to govern. I will vote to pass this compromise legislation and urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to do likewise.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter from President Bush be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, August 4, 1989.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Senate Republican Leader,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR BOB: Last night the savings and loan conferees reached a compromise on the financing plan included in the savings and loan legislation. The compromise avoids any amendment of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings budget process, while including both the Administration's approach to financing and direct Treasury borrowing.

The conferees deserve our thanks and our congratulations. They have worked diligently to fashion a strong and responsible bill to deal with this extraordinarily serious problem. Importantly, the bill includes tough and sensible new capital and accounting standards. Final passage remains critical to the stability and solvency of our financial system.

This legislation has been developed in a bipartisan process. It is badly needed, and must be enacted without further delay. Consequently, I ask that the House and Senate approve this legislation today, and that we pledge to maintain our commitment to resolve this problem.

Sincerely,

GEORGE BUSH.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, if I may, I want to say another word or two. I appreciate the kind words just spoken by the minority leader. An awful lot of people have done a lot of good work on this bill. I want to thank the colleagues on the Banking Committee, all the staff members. I want to thank Kevin Gotlieb and Steve Harris and all the rest of the people on the professional staff of both sides that have worked so hard. I compliment Chairman HENRY GONZALEZ and all the conferees.

Senator GARN and I have worked very closely together on this legislation, as we have over the years. I want to say that I think the relationship that we have had, professionally and personally, has been key to crafting this legislation and bringing it here, I think, with the important aspects that I tried to touch on earlier. So I just want to say that there are a great many people who have worked on this, a lot of people whose names will never be known, who helped produce 1,000 pages, who worked day and night. They have done it to try to help the country. My hat is off to them. I thank all of them—although not by specific name—for the effort they have made and the contribution that they have put forward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROCKEFELLER). Who yields time?

Do the Senators yield back their time?

Mr. GARN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. RIEGLE. I will make only one other comment. There was a concern expressed by Senator DOLE with respect to the RTC. Other people have mentioned that, too. I have great concern how that is going to operate in the future. I think it is going to be very difficult to do it well. I intend to have the most aggressive oversight on that issue, more than any issue we are going to be following. As part of my statement in the RECORD tonight, I say we are going to have periodic hearings as to the RTC functions, policies, and the people it selects, and so forth. We are going to keep a bright light on it as long as I am chairman of this committee.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I shall, regretfully, vote against the conference report on the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989 [FIRREA], commonly referred to as the savings and loan crisis bill. I regret that I am forced to do this, because I believe that the conferees have worked hard on this bill. Unfortunately, the final product is seriously deficient.

I heartily agree that we need a bill to solve the current crisis we face; however, I am not at all convinced that this is the bill that will accomplish that end. We need to provide stability in the financial markets; I am not convinced that this bill accomplishes that. We need to insure economic stability in local communities, and I am quite convinced that this bill does not accomplish that objective. While this bill will undoubtedly pass, as a matter of conscience I feel I must register a protest through my "no" vote.

Let me make clear that my vote is in no way related to one of the major controversies surrounding the conference report—the issue of on-budget or off-budget treatment of the Government infusion of funds. I agreed with the original conference report and with the originator of this proposal, Senator GRAHAM of Florida, that we should address the budgetary issues honestly. Placing the FSLIC bailout partly on-budget and partly off-budget is simply budgetary trickery that will cost the Federal Government more money in the long run and only serves to satisfy the green eyeshade accountants.

The arguments that we have been hearing that on-budget treatment violates the spirit of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings is simply baloney. Senator FRITZ HOLLINGS, a prime author of that budget law, has come out foursquare for on-budget treatments. In fact Senator HOLLINGS argues "the waiver necessary on the S&L bailout is justified both legally and fiscally because this procedure saves billions. The Gramm off-budget shenanigan costs billions more; it destroys the cardinal principle of truth in budgeting of Gramm-Rudman-Hollings and sets a dangerous precedent * * *"

Having said this, my most serious concern about this bill is the structure of the Resolution Trust Corporation. In establishing the Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC] this bill has created a potential monster which may or may not reflect local needs and concerns. The conferees attempted to write a never again bill, which may only result in never again will some local economies recover. I have found nothing in this bill which adequately reassures me, or many of my constituents, that we will not see wholesale dumping of real estate. If this happens, already uncertain local economies could be devastated. This is the case not only in my State of Arizona, but also in Texas, Colorado, Oklahoma and numerous other States. The end result will not only be loss of jobs in local communities, but will negatively affect the national economy for years to come.

I had hoped that the RTC would establish regional offices in all areas where there will be a large number of assets to be disposed. Unfortunately, the bill only makes allowances for six regional offices of the RTC. I am hopeful, though not necessarily optimistic, that rather than locating these offices geographically throughout the United States, they will instead be centered in those States which have the greatest number of troubled institutions. In that regard, I strongly recommend the establishment of an office in Phoenix, AZ.

It is no secret that the savings and loan industry in Arizona has fallen on difficult times. The depression of real estate prices in my State is both its cause and effect. Clearly, the RTC will be called on to dispose of a great deal of real property in Arizona. It is crucial that they understand the local market and consult with local business and community leaders. While the charge of the RTC is to minimize costs to the Federal Government, its mission must also be to minimize the trauma in local community.

I am also disappointed that the bill does not call for local advisory boards in communities that will be severely effected by the RTC's actions. Likewise, the requirement for special asset-disposition procedures in distressed areas appear incomplete and insufficient. While the language in the report contains broad, reassuring platitudes, the specific assistance is less than comforting.

The Arizona State Superintendent of Banks made a serious effort to address some of the bill's shortcomings. Working with a wide cross section of the Arizona economic community, he sought solutions. I ask unanimous consent that a copy of those proposals be inserted in the RECORD at this point. The entire Arizona congressional delegation and our Governor, Rose Mofford, asked the conferees to give these proposals serious consideration. I fear our voices were like a tree falling in the forest, not making a noise because no one was there to listen.

There being no objection, the proposals were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE BANK DEPARTMENT,
Phoenix, AZ.

I have been greatly concerned about the potential effects of the proposed Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989 (the "Bush Plan"). In particular, I am concerned about the effect of Title V of that Act, which would establish the Resolution Trust Corporation ("RTC") to manage insolvent institutions and to warehouse and dispose of assets held by thrifts that are now or will become insolvent over the next three years. Because of the emergency nature of this legislation, some aspects of the bill have not been carefully thought out or addressed. I believe that the impact of the RTC, including the potential for dumping of real estate assets, is one of the areas which needs more attention, and I would like to address that problem in this letter.

To explore this issue, I have formed an advisory committee here in Arizona comprised of the chairmen and CEO's of our state's largest financial institutions, as well as other influential business and government leaders. Former FDIC Chairman Bill Issac recently addressed the group on the impact of the Bush Plan and, as a result of our meetings, we have identified certain key issues which we think are important to your state and ours. I would like in this letter to share those areas of concern with you, and to solicit your assistance in addressing them.

1. RTC Liquidity: One of the most important ways to prevent dumping of real estate by the RTC is to provide it with adequate liquidity. Although the Resolution Funding Corporation ("REFCORP") is authorized to raise fifty billion dollars, that amount simply sets a limit on the losses that can be incurred in the resolution of insolvent thrifts. However, it is clear that the total amount of cash that will be needed under the Bush Plan will exceed fifty billion dollars. This is because depositors must be paid off in cash "up front," while the RTC must wait for repayment of these amounts until it has disposed of assets. Because of this difference in timing, the RTC will face a substantial liquidity problem.

If the RTC is not provided with a liquidity alternative (such as borrowing authority), it will be forced to liquidate assets on an accelerated basis in order to meet its liquidity needs. Consequently, we believe that the RTC should be permitted to borrow money utilizing the full faith and credit of the United States. Although no fixed dollar limit should be placed on the amount of such borrowings, Congress clearly should set a limit of some type so that the ultimate cost to taxpayers does not exceed fifty billion dollars. Therefore, we suggest that a mechanism be provided which would prohibit further borrowing once the RTC has identified expected losses from its operations which equal fifty billion dollars. In other words, every time the RTC consummates a transaction, it would be required to prepare a present value estimate of the loss to be incurred in that transaction. Those estimated losses would be aggregated and, when they total fifty billion dollars, additional borrowing would cease. For additional thoughts on this liquidity issue, I have enclosed a copy of a recent American Banker article in this topic.

2. Financing of Asset Sales: One of the major problems presently facing institutions is the determination of fair market value for its real estate assets. It is clear that the value of property can be significantly dependent upon the manner in which it is proposed to be sold, i.e., cash or terms. Appraisals which attempt to calculate the value based upon a cash sale within thirty days will uniformly be substantially lower than appraisals which assume a financed sale within a longer time period. Although we believe that influencing the RTC appraisal procedures and standards is premature at this time, and should be addressed later, we do believe it appropriate that the legislation mandate that the RTC offer financing for each asset it sells. The financing should be no more stringent than the minimum financing required to prevent the transaction from being a covered transaction as set forth in the Comptroller of the Currency's regulation at 12 C.F.R. 7.3025, and the RTC should be required to separately justify as an exception any transaction for which it does not offer financing.

If the market understands that sales of these assets will be financed, there should be a significant stabilizing effect on prices, and that stabilization can be expected to be at a higher level. In addition, by requiring financing, the universe of potential buyers will be substantially expanded. If financing is not available, and sales are made on a cash only basis, prices will be substantially reduced since only cash rich "bottom fishers" will be able to participate. Excluding bona fide potential purchasers who could complete and/or manage projects, but who need reasonable market rate financing to do it, is not in the best interests of a local economy or the national economy.

Of course, it is likely that a substantial portion of the real estate assets presently in bankrupt thrifts will not be disposed of by the RTC. Instead, those assets will be left in the institutions themselves when they are sold to new ownership. In such cases, it will be the association's management, and not the RTC, which will devise and execute the strategy by which such assets will be disposed. Nevertheless, the RTC will play a paramount role in the development of such strategies, since it is the RTC that will structure the resolution of the insolvent association. Congress should make it clear in the statute that the manner of resolving insolvent institutions must give those institutions substantial incentives to refrain from dumping real estate.

3. Special Consideration Districts: The Senate version of the Bush Plan contains the concept of "distressed areas" and lists several states for inclusion. We believe that the general concept of distressed areas should be retained, but that the name must be changed. We have considered calling them "Special Consideration Districts," but a name might not even be necessary. In addition, we believe that the legislation should not specifically identify any states. Instead, some type of mathematical formula should be used to establish qualification. Such a formula could be the following: a state would qualify when savings and loans holding more than a specified percentage (perhaps thirty-five percent (35%)) of the assets of all savings and loans in the state have been placed into receivership or conservatorship within an identifiable time frame (perhaps within the previous (24) twenty-four months).

The advantages of qualifying for special consideration would include the safeguards already in the bill for distressed areas (e.g. prohibition on sales at less than ninety-five percent of minimum disposition price, etc.), but would also include additional new items. For example, instead of relying on a regional advisory board based upon the current Home Loan Bank Districts, each qualifying state should have its own local advisory board comprised of ten to fifteen persons. Such state boards would have the same statutory stature as a regional board in the Senate bill. Membership on these boards could be designated in the statute to include representatives from special interest groups such as low income housing proponents, etc.

In addition, the RTC would be required to have a local liquidation agent in each qualifying state. That agent should have the authority to set and implement the disposition strategy in that state with guidance from the state advisory board. In addition, the agent should have under its control all assets located in that state which have been received from insolvent savings and loans, regardless of the home state of the savings and loan that actually owned the particular asset. In other words, assets located in state A would be disposed of by the RTC agent in state A, even if those assets had been originated by a savings and loan in state B. This would prevent different arms of the RTC from pursuing conflicting marketing strategies in the same state.

4. Institution Resolution: One of the tools likely to be utilized by the RTC in resolving insolvent institutions is the giving of notes to acquirors of those institutions in lieu of cash payments. We believe that such notes should carry the full faith and credit of the United States in order to enhance their liquidity, lower their rate, and make the institution more attractive to potential buyers. This should speed resolution of the insolvent associations, and hasten the restoration of confidence in a particular state's financial industry.

I hope that I am wrong. I hope that the RTC acts responsibly in consultation with local communities. I shall be watching closely and, when necessary, pushing and prodding the RTC to see that it does not thoroughly disrupt the local economy.

The special interest provisions in this bill are another area of great concern to me. Like the transition rules in tax bills, these special interest provisions undermine the integrity of the legislation, and undermine our integrity with the American public.

To date, the House and Senate Banking Committees have been unwilling to release a complete list of these institution specific provisions. Perhaps some of these are justified; I am willing to be convinced. But I continue to be skeptical of legislative provisions that are hidden away and not acknowledged by their authors.

Senator RIEGLE and the rest of the House and Senate conferees worked long and hard on what is truly a heroic effort. I respect the hard work and effort they put into the bill. My vote against this conference report in no way indicates a lack of respect, or might I add admiration, for the conferees and their staffs.

Perhaps 5 years from now we will look back and declare this bill a success. Or perhaps we will ask ourselves how we could have been so shortsighted, and how in our rush to punish the savings and loan industry, we undermined the growth of our economy.

Mr. BRADLEY. Mr. President, I am voting against the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery and Enforcement Act of 1989. The bill leaves unanswered too many fundamental issues. I believe the American taxpayer demands more.

The bill does make certain improvements in the savings and loan industry. It provides funding to help fulfill the insurance obligations we have to the depositors of failed thrifts. It calls for this money to be raised and spent in part on-budget, as it should be. It mandates eventual adoption of risk-based capital requirements equivalent to those being set for commercial banks, with additional provision made for interest rate risk. It strengthens current enforcement practices and curbs some of the excessive activities permitted by some State banking authorities.

These are steps in the right direction. But we should not accept the President's claim that this legislation will "ensure that this never happens again."

Indeed, I fully expect that we will have to revisit the S&L issue within the next 5 years, if only to provide additional money for the resolution of insolvent thrifts. The funding provided by the bill is, by all accounts, insufficient to address the full scope of the problem. The cost estimates are based on unrealistic economic assumptions and, as noted in a Brookings study released this week, may understate the number of troubled thrifts. More money will be needed even if we manage to escape other shocks to the system, such as a spike in interest rates.

Providing the funds needed to quickly close insolvent thrifts and to fulfill our obligations to the depositor must be our first priority, especially since each day of delay is costing the American taxpayer $10 to $20 million.

But this bill goes way beyond simply providing the needed moneys. It makes far-reaching reforms to the entire regulatory and institutional structure governing the thrift industry. I question the wisdom of trying to design reform in the current crisis atmosphere. In the rush to get something done, we are introducing changes in an arbitrary fashion, without any clear sense of where we want to go, or of what we expect the thrift industry—indeed, the entire financial services industry—to look like at the turn of the century.

I am particularly concerned that we have not fully considered the role the savings and loan industry should play in our economy. Nor have we questioned and evaluated whether the deposit insurance system is working the way we intended. And, in our desire to speedily deal with the S&L crisis, I fear we are missing the implications it could have for the rest of the banking industry.

Mr. President, the savings and loan industry was created a half century ago, when the Depression threatened to destroy the American dream of home ownership. But the environment in which the S&L's operate has changed in the intervening decades. In particular, interest rate deregulation ended the Federal government subsidy which allowed S&L's to accept the risk implicit in holding short-term deposits against long-term assets. While interest rate deregulation was the correct policy, that reform—perhaps like this—was done in a piecemeal fashion, and the costs to the industry were quickly apparent.

We recognized this when we began deregulating the asset side of the thrift balance sheet, reducing the qualified thrift lender [QTL] test, increasing the investment activities permitted thrifts, and encouraging the use of adjustable rate mortgages. These changes were generally welcomed by the industry. While some abused the new privileges, the vast majority of thrifts found a balance between traditional and new activities that promoted both profitability and stability. This began to close the gap between the functional roles of thrifts and commercial banks. But thrifts, it seems to me, continue to be disproportionately vulnerable to interest rate risk, especially given the impact a rise in rates might have on capped ARMs, both to consumers and to thrifts.

By introducing structural reforms into the thrift industry that are only partly responsive to the problems that lie ahead, we may be actually increasing the risk to the healthy S&L's. Our first and foremost task should be to isolate and close, as quickly as possible, the unhealthy institutions. But then I think we need to spend some time assessing the wisdom of the bifurcation that now characterizes our banking industry.

The speed with which this legislation was prepared prevented consideration of this. The role of the thrift industry was assumed, not analyzed. As a result, not only does this legislation not recognize that thrifts are ill-prepared to hold long-term debt, it actually mandates higher amounts. In addition, by continuing to lump all thrifts together, we are forcing the healthy S&L's to bear an enormous cost, as we increase insurance rates, and reduce FHLBB dividends.

The result may be the undermining of perfectly good financial institutions, in my state and others, in order to give a transfusion to the one or two states that represent the vast majority of the thrift failures. It would have made far more sense to spread this burden over the entire financial industry. But since we failed to evaulate the S&L's in the context of a rapidly evolving financial industry, we failed to develop a rationale or a justification for spreading the burden.

We cannot afford to let the S&L industry remain separate and distinct if we have to treat it as a delicate flower, which we can keep alive, but only in a hothouse with climate controls and special nutrition. The cost of the hothouse is simply too exorbitant.

Our concern must be with the function, not the form. In today's sophisticated financial world, the mortgage delivery and the mortgage-holding functions can be separated. Banks, thrifts and other institutions can originate the mortgages, but the interest rate risk that comes from holding mortgages can be more efficiently borne by long-term investors, such as insurance companies, pension funds, and trust funds. The challenge of legislating will be to take the efficiency gains of such an arrangement while assuring those holding long-term mortgages maintain a social conscience.

This does not mean an end to thrifts. Many of these firms are profitable and well run. Many tend to be smaller, occupying a special niche in the broader banking community. But the extent to which individual institutions specialize in one financial service or another should not govern their regulatory treatment.

We still need to ensure adequate credit for housing finance but some integration of banks and thrifts need not affect this negatively. As long as the demand for housing exists, financial institutions will provide funding, since single-family mortgages are profitable and entail generally less credit risk. This low-risk factor is recognized in the risk-adjusted capital standards being promulgated for commercial banks, which alone will encourage banks to provide housing finance. And, of course, the Government will continue to provide other incentives to the housing industry, through the tax code, guarantee agencies and direct funding.

In addition, the Federal Home Loan Bank should continue to provide housing finance. Indeed, its role could actually be expanded by permitting any institution that can efficiently deliver and hold mortgages access to its funds window. This could prove by far a more effective, efficient, and equitable means to realize our home ownership goal.

Mr. President, if the systemic weakness of the S&L industry is a major cause of the crisis we face today, it has been compounded by the lack of adequate protections against the problem that deposit insurance creates, namely, giving bank and thrift managers and owners unlimited access to government guaranteed funds which they can invest with minimal risk to their own capital.

The key solution to this problem, as this bill recognizes, is adequate capitalization. But the bill does not go far enough in this regard. The immediate tangible capital requirement of 1.5 percent is simply too low. While this will be corrected as the role of goodwill is decreased over 5 years and tangible capital increase toward the 3 percent "leverage limit," the unfortunate fact is that the FDIC will face this "moral hazard" risk in the interim.

I should note here that there is little justification for this. Goodwill as an economic asset is meant to reflect the intangible value of an acquired asset—in the case of the S&L, its franchise. But the creation of goodwill in the thrift industry in recent years has not been based upon this definition. Instead, goodwill has come to mean the difference between the liabilities and the assets of a thrift, less the capital that the acquiring interest is willing to contribute. The effect is perverse—the weaker a thrift, the more goodwill it creates. This is just wrong. And enshrining it in the 3 percent leverage limit is unacceptable.

Again, I fear that part of the reason the bill accepts this risk is that it is concerned more about the form than the function, the institutions rather than the depositors. We cannot afford this. We should instead be providing the regulators sufficient funding to close shakey institutions now, today, not in 2, 3, or 5 years. The problem is simply too enormous to let it grow.

But in addition, the problems of moral hazard should force us to re-examine the role of deposit insurance. Again, the insurance system was created more than half a century ago, as a response to the tragic human and economic costs of the Depression. The basic policy is sound: Our government has an obligation to ensure that no individual sees his life savings wiped out. This is not only a moral responsibility; it makes economic sense as it injects confidence and stability into the financial system. But if the concept is sound, the practice has soured.

The deposit insurance system was established to ensure that depositors never again need fear a total loss of their savings. We continue to recognize this principle by "limiting" the amount of insurance coverage to $100,000 (up from $2,500 when the deposit insurance system was created and up from $40,000 just 7 years ago).

But now, since we insure accounts rather than individuals, what we have is universal deposit insurance, covering all deposits by any and all depositors. We have strayed far from the original purpose of the program. As a result, the contingent liability we so long ignored has mushroomed almost beyond comprehension. The refusal to address the account versus individual issue or to consider modification of the $100,000 limit was, in my judgment, another shortcoming of the bill, particularly when one realizes that the average deposit in an S&L is far below the limit.

Furthermore, we can no longer afford to be so sanguine about this contingent liability. We need to limit it. We need to return to the original concept that not every account, but every individual, is guaranteed that a certain amount of his savings cannot be lost.

Of course, some individuals and businesses may want additional insurance. This can—and should—be provided by private insurance firms.

Moving to individual insurance instead of account insurance might not only reduce and make more manageable the Federal Government's contingent liability, it could also create multiple layers of regulation for depository institutions. For example, larger depositors would more carefully select their banks. The private insurance companies would also carefully monitor a bank's performance, and would even refuse to provide coverage for those deemed to be imprudently run. This alone would function as a "rating" system, encouraging that more deposits would flow to better companies.

Mr. President, the problem of deposit insurance is far larger than the S&L problem alone. We cannot permit ourselves to be so consumed by the S&L crisis that we neglect the commercial banking system, where our liabilities dwarf by some order of magnitude those we are facing with thrifts.

Commercial banks in general are healthy. This should not stop us from anticipating future structural changes now. The international competitive environment facing our banks has changed, as has their operating environment here. In addition, despite the record profits of the banking industry last year, the Brookings Institute study released this week rightly sounds a note of warning about the condition of the industry. Using a slightly modified risk-adjusted measure, Brookings identifies 28 large banks with $23 billion in assets that are in effect insolvent; another 48 institutions with $43 billion in assets had capital ratios of less than 3 percent. This alone is deeply disturbing; more disturbing still is that the Brookings study doesn't even take off-balance-sheet contingent abilities into account. The authors conclude that FDIC is in effect practicing forebearance in much the same way the FSLIC did during most of this decade.

Rather than waiting for the crisis to hit, we should be encouraging our regulators to try to intervene at the earliest possible moment, when the first signs of a serious downward trend show up, not just when that trend has passed some magic number and the bank is bordering on insolvency.

Mr. President, the potential problem in the commercial banking sector raises a final issue—the need to ensure that all depository institutions are adequately regulated.

This bill recognizes that this is a problem, and authorizes additional funds to hire qualified regulators. I am not sure that the amount authorized is sufficient. In my experience, the vast majority of bankers—whether in thrifts or commercial banks—are of the highest integrity. But as the GAO has so recently documented, the greatest single source of threat to our S&L system are those few individuals who are not so honorable. In virtually every case reviewed by the GAO, the managers/owners not only engaged knowingly in illegal activity, but often did so after having been warned by the regulators.

Perhaps, just perhaps, we would not be facing this crisis had the regulators been adequately paid and staffed. The penny-wise and pound-foolish result of this underfunding is graphically portrayed in a Bernstein Research report to FDIC, which points out that the $800 million cost to FDIC of resolving the American Diversified Savings bankruptcy was 14 times the national budget for supervision and enforcement, enough to pay 16,000 supervisors at an average annual salary of $50,000—more than 10 times the total supervisory personnel in the entire regulatory system. Preventing one medium sized failure would provide funds to put regulators in institutions on a full time basis. This bill offered an opportunity to squarely face and solve the supervisory and regulatory shortfall. I regret we did little more than acknowledge the problem and take a small step in the right direction.

The urgency of a more comprehensive regulatory approach is critical because, in passing this bill, we are placing an enormous administrative burden on the FDIC. We must ensure that this burden does not prevent the FDIC from fulfilling its current mission—monitoring the commercial banks. We must encourage them to submit to us a realistic assessment of their needs. And, whatever our budget constraints, we should be prepared to meet those needs. This, at least, we owe our taxpayers * * * and our children.

I know the committee has worked long and hard on this bill. The conference report is a marked improvement over the earlier version and I congratulate them for their diligence. I regret, however, that I cannot support the bill, not so much for what it does, but for what it fails to do and for what this failure implies for our financial future.

Mr. GARN. I would like to raise a technical point with Senator RIEGLE. The original administration proposal called for the Federal preemption of State law with respect to certain provisions of the legislation. In many cases, the administration proposal specifically preempted State constitutions. The conference report, however, does not specifically preempt State constitutions, but instead overrides State law generally where such an override is deemed necessary. What was the reason for this change?

Mr. RIEGLE. I am glad that the Senator from Utah raised that point. It is unnecessary to specifically mention State constitutions in these provisions. State constitutions, as well as State statutory provisions are automatically overridden whenever a Federal statute preempts State law. Thus, it is not necessary to specify State constitutions. Whenever this bill preempts State law, it preempts all State law, including State constitutions.

HOSTILE TAKEOVERS IN THE BANKING INDUSTRY

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise to address an issue that was of concern to me when we considered this bill back in April.

The issue is takeovers within the banking industry. Indeed, I was a cosponsor of the amendment to prevent banks that receive substantial FDIC assistance from participating in the hostile acquisition of other banking institutions. The amendment was intended to limit the unfair competitive advantage that banks receiving such assistance have in mounting hostile acquisitions and to encourage the return of these banks to private ownership.

The issue of bank hostile takeovers is a continuing concern of mine for I fear such activity poses great potential for harm to the Nation's banking system. Confidence has been deeply shaken in our Nation's savings institutions. We have a responsibility to do all we can to shore up that loss of faith.

As you know, the House Banking Committee shares our concern over this activity and has committed to hearings in the coming weeks. Additionally, the House Banking Committee included very strong language in its report H.R. 1278, the Financial Institutions Reform, Recover and Enforcement Act of 1989. I would particularly draw your attention to the following excerpts from that report:

> The committee believes that such use of government ownership can unfairly handicap privately owned financial institutions . . . the committee expects that the agencies will fully factor these policy considerations into their review of particular transactions pending further congressional action.

The Senate concurs with this House conclusion. Indeed, Mr. President, we are already seeing a positive response to our concerns by the various regulatory agencies. However, we need to continue to monitor this situation. I commend the House's commitment to hold hearings and I urge my collegues here in the Senate to do the same.

As we prepare to vote final passage on the conference report, let us remember that the winds of uncertainty are blowing about the millions of depositors in federally insured banks as a result of the documented excesses of the thrift industry. Investor confidence has been shaken and this Congress, together with our Nation's regulators, must work hard to ensure the safety and soundness of our insurance funds. The stability of our Nation's banking system must be our paramount concern. Hostile takeovers do nothing to add to that stability.

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANKS

Mr. GARN. In sections 702 the joint offices of the Federal home loan banks, including the Office of Regulatory Activity, are terminated. Provisions of sections 722 and 723, however, provide for a 60-day transition period and a 120-day assignment period. Those sections also provide for a period of time during which the Federal home loan banks continue to pay all or part of the costs of compensation for personnel transferring from the banks and joint offices, even after those employees have transferred. Additionally, the Federal home loan banks are required to provide facilities and support services for the supervisory and examination personnel for a period of time after enactment. How are these provisions reconciled?

Mr. HEINZ. Even though the offices are terminated, the agency functions are not, those functions are very important. The conferees intended that following enactment, during the transition period, the Federal home loan banks will continue to support and fund the examination and supervisory functions now conducted at the banks and joint offices. We are concerned that the supervisory and examination functions now performed by the Federal loan banks and joint offices not to be disrupted during the transition process that will follow enactment. Accordingly, until the personnel are transferred from the banks and joint offices to the Office of Thrift Supervision, we clearly intend that the banks continue to fund and support those operations, consistent with current practice, during transition and following transfer as provided in the act.

Mr. CRANSTON. Title III, section 301, subsection 5(u) applies the commercial bank loan-to-one-borrower limits to thrifts. The national bank rule at 12 U.S.C. 84, which will applied to thrifts, presently exempts some loans which are "fully secured by collateral" from the loan-to-one-borrower rules. Examples of loans receiving full or partial exemptions are loans secured by deposits, Treasury bills and livestock. No housing loans of any nature are exempted from loans to one borrower. Do you agree that the role of smaller well-capitalized thrifts in housing would be well served if the banking and thrift regulatory agencies would consider developing regulations, with due consideration for safety and soundness, which might exempt certain housing loans collat- eralized by single family residential real estate in the same fashion that certain secured commercial bank loans are exempted under the loan-to-borrower rules?

Mr. GARN. Yes, I believe that the development of such regulations would give the regulators needed flexibility in dealing with the fully collateralized residential lending activities of well-capitalized, smaller banks and thrifts, especially those that operate in high cost areas.

Mr. CRANSTON. I thank the Senator.

OFFICE OF THRIFT SUPERVISION

Mr. GARN. In conference, Senate and House conferees voted to remove the House requirement that the Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision consult with the Secretary of the Treasury when setting compensation levels. Does the Senator from Michigan agree that the vote affirmatively gave the Director sole authority over administrative and personnel matters at the Office of Thrift Supervision?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes, I agree, Mr. President. And the conferees intended to give the Director authority parallel to that given the Comptroller of the Currency under the act. Both have exclusive authority over all personnel related matters including authority to decide the number of and direct employees, determine the work assigned, compensation, including pay and benefits—in short the authority to establish and supervise all aspects of the organization.

Mr. GARN. One final point. Under the comparability provisions, when will discrepancies between the banking agencies' levels of compensation be eliminated?

Mr. RIEGLE. We expect immediate changes and hope for full comparability within 3 years of enactment.

JUNK BONDS

Mr. GARN. I would like to clarify one point regarding the definition of junk bonds. It is my understanding that this definition is not intended to include bona fide loan participations that are issued in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. HEINZ. I concur with this interpretation.

LIABILITY INSURANCE CONTRACTS AND FINANCIAL INSTITUTION BONDS

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, I would like to address an important provision adopted by the conference committee which affects the enforcement of Director's and Officers' liability insurance contracts and financial institution bonds. As we know from the past liability insurance crisis that this country experienced in 1985–86, it is essential for bank and thrift directors to have liability insurance available to them in order to get well-qualified people to serve on such boards. At a time when the thrift industry greatly needs strong independent directors, we need to make sure that we are not enacting provisions which will fundamentally deter honest, able people from serving as directors or officers of financial institutions.

The conference report includes a provision which grants powers to the FDIC to enforce contracts in receivership at section 212 which adds section 11(e)(12) to the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. Both the House and Senate agreed that this provision is not intended to apply to Director's and Officers' liability insurance contracts or financial institution bonds.

Mr. GARN. Mr. President, would the distinguished Senator from North Carlina yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. GARN. I agree with the comments of Senator SANFORD with respect to this issue.

I have had our counsel carefully review current law and found the following. Substantially all courts, including a court of appeals decision, which have considered the provisions in financial institution bonds which provide that coverage terminates upon the appointment of a receiver have upheld such provisions as enforceable with respect to fidelity or indemnity bonds. See Sharp v. Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, 858 F.2d 1042 (5th Cir. 1988).

With respect to Directors' and Officers' liability insurance contracts, there has been a substantial split in the decisions relating to the validity of regulatory exclusion clauses that prohibits a regulator from enforcing rights under the contract. Compare Continental Casualty Co. v. Allen et al., No. CA-5-86-252-C (N.D. Tex. Apr. 3, 1989) with Branning v. CNA Insurance Companies No. C.88-764 R (WD Wash. Apr. 19, 1989).

It is not the intent of the conferees to influence these decisions, or to affect the development of case law or statutory provisions relating to the validity of these clauses and director and officer liability insurance contracts or fidelity or indemnity bonds. The intent of the conferees is to remain neutral on these matters.

PASSIVE INVESTMENTS

Mr. SANFORD. The proposal, dealing with passive investments of a securities firm affiliated with a savings and loan holding company in the conference report, permits acquisitions by an underwriter of more than 5 percent of the shares of an insured institution or a holding company thereof in the ordinary course of its underwriting activities. Does this include stabilization purchases incident to underwriting?

Mr. GARN. Yes, it does. Such purchases are not effected with any intent to change control of the institution, but are incident to the underwriting process and are, therefore, exempt.

Mr. SANFORD. The proposal also permits acquisitions by a dealer of more than 5 percent of the shares of an insured institution or a holding company thereof in its capacity as a dealer in the ordinary course of its trading activities. Does this include acquisitions by the dealer as part of the its block trading, market making and odd-lot trading activities?

Mr. GARN. Yes, it does. Such acquisitions are not effected for the purpose of changing control of the acquired institution or a holding company thereof, but are usual and customary and incident to the acquiror's activities as a dealer.

LOANS TO ONE BORROWER

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, in reading title III section 301, subparagraph (5)(U) of H.R. 1278, it would appear that the new loan to one borrower limitations in the bill would become effective immediately upon enactment. This would require thrifts to divest themselves of existing loans that were in compliance with the law when they were made. Was it the intent of conferees to imply that this section be retroactive?

Mr. RIEGLE. It is the intention of the conferees that the reference to section 5200 of the Revised Statutes relative to limitations on loans to one borrower be applied prospectively, that is, only to loans originated or committed to be made subsequent to the date of enactment of the bill.

Mr. GARN. This provision is not intended to have a retroactive effect. It would simply be unfair for savings associations operating legally within the then existing laws to be placed at risk upon enactment of this new provision. It certainly is our intent that the provisions apply on a forward basis only.

MORTGAGE SERVICING RIGHTS

Mr. D'AMATO. I rise to engage my distinguished colleagues, Senators GARN, HEINZ, and CRANSTON in a colloquy on two issues, the tangible capital treatment of purchased mortgage servicing rights and the credit risk-weighting of purchased mortgage servicing rights.

Am I correct that the conferees agreed and intend that the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation will determine the maximum amount of purchased mortgage servicing rights that can be counted in meeting the tangible capital test, subject to further restriction that may be imposed by the Federal Thrift regulator? Thus the FDIC could authorize up to 100 percent of the tangible capital test be met by the inclusion of purchased mortgage servicing rights.

Second, as to credit risk-weighting of purchased mortgage servicing rights, is it your understanding that the conference report language dealing with the risk-based capital standards permits the Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision to set credit-risk weights for purchased mortgage servicing rights as he deems appropriate in light of the risks involved in holding such assets?

Additionally, would it be correct to say that the Director may consider that purchased mortgage servicing rights involve underlying assets which may be highly secure and, therefore, the Director may consider this fact in making any determination of the appropriate credit-risk weight for purchased mortgage servicing rights? Thus, under the proviso that the Director may deviate from national bank standards for purposes of the risk-based capital requirements, DOTS could give purchased mortgage servicing rights a risk-weighting of less than 100 percent.

Mr. GARN. The understanding of the Senator from New York is correct.

Mr. HEINZ. I want to concur and thank the Senator from New York for his comments.

Mr. CRANSTON. I want to wholeheartedly concur with the observations of my distinguished colleagues. I share their understanding of the intent of the conferees on the matters we have been discussing.

HOLDING COMPANY PROVISIONS

Mr. CRANSTON. I rise to engage the distinguished ranking member of the Banking Committee in a colloquy. The bill reenacts section 408 of the National Housing Act, transferring to the Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision the authority to issue rules, regulations, and orders to carry out the purposes of the holding company provisions of the act. Do I understand correctly that the conferees intend that the Director will retain the flexibility needed to respond to the wide variety of situations which may arise in addressing holding company issues by adopting rules and regulations to address recurring situations and orders to deal with specific cases?

Mr. GARN. The Senator's understanding is correct.

APPLICABILITY OF CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS

Mr. D'AMATO. I would like to ask Mr. GARN a question concerning the applicability of the capital requirements of the bill to savings associations. It is my understanding that the capital requirements established under the bill apply separately and not on a consolidated basis to a savings association and each existing subsidiary savings association acquired before May 1, 1989. Is my understanding correct?

Mr. GARN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. D'AMATO. Am I also correct in understanding that the capital provisions of the bill do not affect the public reporting of income or the statement of condition of savings associations under generally accepted accounting principles?

Mr. GARN. Yes, the Senator is correct.

Mr. D'AMATO. I thank the Senator.

CONSERVATOR OR RECEIVER POWERS

Mr. GARN. The FDIC's powers as conservator or receiver are set forth in section 212 of this bill.

The legislation provides that the FDIC is permitted, in its capacity as conservator or receiver, to repudiate certain contracts which are determined to be burdensome if it will promote the orderly administration of the financial institution's affairs. My understanding is that these determinations must be made on an individual, contract by contract basis. Is this correct?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes, it is correct.

CONVERSION MORATORIUM PROVISION

Mr. GARN. I would like to take the opportunity to clarify the application of the conversion moratorium provisions. As I understand it, the moratorium generally prohibits a member of the Savings Association Insurance Fund from leaving that fund and becoming a member of the Bank Insurance Fund during the 5 years after the bill becomes law

Mr. RIEGLE. That is correct.

Mr. GARN. It is also my understanding that a savings association insured by the FSLIC that is exempt from the present moratorium on FSLIC-to-FDIC conversions imposed by the Competitive Equality Banking Act of 1987, would lose its ability to switch insurance funds under the pending legislation if it did not convert the FDIC insurance before the bill becomes law.

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes, since the conversion moratorium provisions of this legislation contain no exception for thrifts grandfathered under CEBA, an institution that was exempt under CEBA would still be subject to the new 5-year moratorium. This would be the case even if the thrift had applied to convert or was involved in litigation with any of the Federal regulators over its status before the bill was enacted. In determining whether the proposed conversion is permissible, you would look to the law in effect at the time the transaction is consummated, not what the law was when the application or lawsuit was filed.

AFFORDABLE HOUSING PROVISION OF THE S&L BAILOUT BILL

Mr. NICKLES. Mr. President, I rise today with a great deal of concern regarding a provision tucked away inside this huge Savings and Loan bailout bill that, ironically, may contribute to the fiscal demise of the very institutions we are trying to assist.

Under title 7, section 721, of the bill there is an onerous requirement placed upon the 12 Federal Home Loan Banks and their member institutions. This affordable housing provision will require each of the 12 banks to set aside a certain percentage of their annual net earnings for the purpose of subsidizing below-market interest rate loans for their member-thrifts to finance low-income housing mortgages.

A minimum requirement of 5 percent of net earnings from each bank must be provided for this housing program from 1990 through 1993. During this period, a minimum of $50 million from all banks must be paid into this program. But do not be fooled by this minimum figure. There is no ceiling on this requirement, so the set-aside amount would be limitless.

Last year the net earnings from the 12 Federal Home Loan Banks totaled approximately $1.9 billion—5 percent of this is $95 million. That far exceeds the misleading $50 million minimum set-aside requirement within the bill. How can we project the costs of such an open-ended provision for future years?

In 1994, the requirement goes to 6 percent per bank. And finally, in 1995 and beyond, each bank must set aside an incredible 10 percent of the preceding year's net income to go toward these housing subsidies.

We are talking about providing limitless, hundreds of millions of dollars to subsidize low-income housing—in a banking bill.

This is not a banking bill—this is a housing bill.

Section 721 of the bill is titled "Affordable Housing". My colleagues from New York and California, Senator D'AMATO and Senator CRANSTON already have a bill entitled "The National Affordable Housing Act". I do not recall them including any major thrift provisions in their bill. So why does a bill aimed at assisting our Nation's ailing thrifts have a potential multi-billion-dollar affordable housing provision attached to it?

This provision is not aimed at solving our current thrift crisis. This provision will only add to our thrift problems and perhaps contribute to the future demise of the very system we intend to bail out.

It is one thing to support the spending of over $250 billion to bail out our ailing thrift industry. It is another to be voting for a gigantic increase in housing subsidies under the guise of savings and loan assistance.

THE FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS REFORM, RECOVERY, AND ENFORCEMENT ACT OF 1989

Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, I commend the administration for coming to terms with the savings and loan crisis so quickly and for proposing the legislation that served as the basis for the conference report on which we are voting today. I also commend the chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator RIEGLE, the ranking member, Senator GARN, and all the committee members and staff for holding exhaustive hearings, making improvements, and moving the legislation through the conference with the House as expeditiously as they did.

The conference report before us is a compromise. I preferred the administration's financing approach because I believe that the practice of raising the deficit but exempting the increase from the only mechanism in place to control the deficit—the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act—is fraudulent. But it was clear that the other side was not going to give on this point. So, the conferees met again last night and reached a compromise that is acceptable to the administration.

It is not overstating the case to call the savings and loan problem a crisis. The S&L industry is hemorrhaging at a rate of $20 to $30 million a day. The amount of money we've already spent to rescue insolvent thrifts, and the cost of recapitalizing the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation [FSLIC] in order to bail out the roughly 500 more S&L's that will become insolvent between now and 1991, is staggering. Add to this the costs we will incur from interest payments over the next 30 years, and it is clear that we are in the middle of an economic crisis.

Strengthening the capital requirements of thrifts is one way to prevent further crises. In fact, raising the capital standard is the strongest and most critical requirement in the conference report. It is the backbone of the legislation.

Capital is the difference between a thrift's assets and its liabilities. It is a buffer to absorb bad loans and protect depositors—and, ultimately, taxpayers—from losses. I view stronger capital standards as the most important way to minimize the impact of future S&L losses on Government insurance funds. It is my hope that the new, stringent capital standard will encourage responsible behavior among thrifts, and in so doing, prevent future insolvencies.

Another way in which we can prevent this disaster from recurring is by requiring unscrupulous thrift owners and operators to pay for their abuses. Outright fraud and embezzlement led to one-third of all thrift failures. The legislation addresses this by increasing civil money penalties in cases when a bank, thrift, or credit union, or an individual connected to the institution, violates regulations or engages in an unsafe or unsound practice to $25,000 per day or to $1 billion per day in the case of reckless violations. I am confident that this and other requirements contained in the S&L bill will discourage abuse and mismanagement on the part of S&L owners and operators now and in the future.

Finally, a bill this big and complex, and involving so much money, is bound to prompt concerns. I would like to express mine. My chief concern is the Oversight Board of the Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC]. The Comptroller General of the United States, Charles Bowsher, has also voiced concern about this matter.

Congress has made the Oversight Board of the RTC directly accountable for the management of the Asset Disposition Program, and theoretically, the Board should be able to operate more effectively than as originally proposed. But we are talking about an agency that is endowed with a huge responsibility—disposing of hundreds of billions of dollars' worth of thrift assets. I am worried that we are asking a great amount from the members of the Oversight Board—consisting of the Treasury Secretary, the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, and two independent members—who have myriad responsibilities to begin with. I sincerely hope each will devote careful attention to his or her duties that devolve as a result of this legislation.

CONVERSION OF THRIFT CHARTERS

Mr. WIRTH. Mr. President, I seek recognition to inquire about certain provisions contained in the savings and loan conference report now before the Senate. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Banking Committee, Senator RIEGLE, to clarify provisions in the legislation concerning the conversion of thrift charters to bank charters.

Is it correct that the provisions of this act that permit thrifts to be converted to banks are not intended to allow banks resulting from such conversions to establish, retain, maintain, or operate branches that do not comply with the laws relative to the establishment and operation of bank branches or offices in the respective States where such banks are located?

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. WIRTH. I thank the Senator for his attention to this matter.

Mr. GARN. The bill generally applies the restrictions of sections 23(a) and 23(b) of the Federal Reserve Act to transactions between savings associations and their affiliates to the same extent that those restrictions apply to member banks. Is that correct?

Mr. RIEGLE. That is correct.

Mr. SANFORD. Am I correct in believing that the bill does not limit the Federal Reserve Board from exercising its authority to grant exceptions from sections 23(a) and 23(b) for savings associations that are controlled by savings and loan holding companies? In particular, I wonder if the Board may in individual cases or by regulation grant savings associations that are owned by savings and loan holding companies the sister bank exception at any time after the bill is enacted?

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator is correct. The bill establishes a general rule permitting savings associations owned by savings and loan holding companies to take advantage of the sister bank exception in section 23(a) after 5 years. The Federal Reserve Board would, of course, continue to have full authority to grant exceptions to the provisions of sections 23(a) and 23(b), either individually or by regulation, that would be consistent with the purposes of sections 23(a) and 23(b) prior to the expiration of the 5-year period.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator, and the ranking minority member of the Banking Committee, and the Senator from North Carolina that his interpretation is correct.

BANKING "BAILOUT AND RECOVERY" BILL

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, I rise to make it clear that, if the Senate had decided to cast a recorded vote on the legislation before us, I would have voted a loud and thundering "no." Like my colleagues who share this view, I can count. The President and the proponents of this package in this body have more than enough votes to pass this legislation. But I feel it's my duty and obligation to make my feelings on this matter known.

For the past several months, since the Senate first acted on the bill dubbed the "Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act," I have been back home, to my State of West Virginia, talking with, hearing from, listening to my constituents on the crisis of savings and loans institutions, and the plan that Congress had crafted to solve that crisis.

The people of West Virginia have a very clear notion of what this plan is about. It proposes to spend up to $300 billion, part of which will be spent bailing out failing and crippled banks, on giving crutches and emergency treatment to ailing banks, and selling off those too sick to make it.

Mr. President, I am voting no to express my disdain about the situation before us. The entire mess should have never occurred. A regulatory system should have been in place, with cops and watch dogs on the beat. S&L's in Texas, California, Oklahoma, and other States—not West Virginia, I might note—should have been allowed to speculate and lend in totally careless and reckless ways. The "anything goes" attitude that prevailed among numerous S&L's has dumped a legacy that our taxpayers—along with their children and grandchildren—will pay for decades to come.

I am angry and frustrated about a past that now haunts us. I vote against this legislation out of that outrage, and to stand up for the people of West Virginia who should not be saddled with the sins and mistakes of others.

I do not recognize the enormous effort of Senator RIEGLE and others to include in this bill a number of major positive measures to make the entire system governing and protecting our banking system far stronger. But those are measures that can still be passed separately. I pledge that I will support everything and anything to assure that this horrendous situation is never repeated.

CAPITAL STANDARDS

Mr. WIRTH. Would the Senator from Michigan yield for a question pertaining to the capital requirements?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes.

Mr. WIRTH. As I understand it, all the capital standards adopted by the thrift regulator must be no less stringent than the capital standards adopted by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WIRTH. The tangible capital requirement adopted by the thrift regulator must be no less stringent than the tangible capital standard adopted by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency. The language of the bill defines thrift tangible capital as "core capital minus any intangible assets—as intangible assets are defined by the Comptroller of the Currency for national banks." Because the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency has a de facto tangible capital requirement in that it limits intangibles to 25 percent of core capital, the number selected by the thrift regulator for the tangible capital standard must be equal to or greater than 75 percent of the number selected by the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency for core capital to total assets. For example, if the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency establishes that a bank must have 3 percent core capital to total assets, it effectively requires 2.25 percent tangible capital to total assets because 75 percent of that core capital must be tangible. So the way the bill would would work is that the 1.5 percent tangible capital requirement is a floor, but the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency may set a higher floor, is that correct?

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator is absolutely correct. One-hundred and twenty days from enactment, thrifts will be required to have tangible capital equal to at least 1.5 percent of total assets. But if the OCC were to issue a regulation stating banks had to have 3 percent core capital to total assets, the thrift regulator would immediately be required to issue a regulation requiring thrifts to have 2.25 percent tangible capital.

HOUSING PROVISIONS IN FSLIC BILL

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, the conference report on the thrift crisis legislation contains two provisions that would provide more affordable housing. The Senator from Texas, in a "Dear Colleague" letter and on the floor, has made a number of allegations about these provisions that are so misleading they should not go unanswered.

Several housing provisions were included in the House bill by Members who believed that this massive rescue should be implemented with some recognition of the intense need for decent, affordable housing in this country.

The conferees amended the House provisions to make them consistent with the bill's overall objective of achieving reform and recovery of the thrift industry at the least cost to the taxpayers.

One important reason to include some provisions in this bill that are favorable to affordable housing is that these provisions are needed to help offset the effects of other provisions in the bill that, unavoidably, are hostile to affordable housing.

Does the bill provide a major housing initiative? Of course not.

Let's look at the facts. Two provisions are involved.

One provision deals with the sale of housing that is owned by the Resolution Trust Corporation [RTC]. RTC would be permitted to sell a single family home only to: First a resident home buyer whose income does not exceed 115 percent of the area median; or second; a public agency or nonprofit organization for a period of 3 months after the home is put on the market.

Property disposition experts at FSLIC, FDIC, Fannie Mae, and Freddie Mac have found that aggressive marketing of homes to these buyers is the best way to get the best return. This provision of the bill is also needed to prevent real estate speculators from snapping up these houses for a quick profit.

Multifamily housing would be handled differently. During the several months that are needed to prepare a property for sale, prospective buyers who want to make the housing affordable to low income families would be given a "first look" at the details of the property. These buyers could include nonprofit organizations, public agencies and for-profit developers.

This "first look" would permit these buyers a little extra time to arrange financing so they can keep the property as affordable housing. Property disposition experts have found that this "first look" approach often accelerates the sale. Once the property is ready for sale, a "first look" buyer would have to make a bona fide offer within 45 days or the property could be sold without restriction. On balance, the conference agreement is more likely to accelerate RTC property sales than to delay them.

The conference report requires that properties be sold at their market value, discounted only for reductions in holding costs and other savings resulting from expedited sales. Only in very limited circumstances, would the RTC be permitted—at its discretion—to provide further concessions on price and seller financing. Property disposition experts have found that such concessions are at times necessary for prudent management.

The conferees worked closely with property disposition experts at FSLIC and FDIC to ensure that these provisions could be implemented in the interest of the taxpayers and with a minimum of administrative burden.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board wrote the conferees in support of provisions of the conference agreement. I ask that a copy of that letter be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

CBO estimated that the original House provision would cost a total of $300 million over a 5-to-7-year period. The conference agreement greatly reduced or eliminated elements of the House provision that would have produced those costs.

The Senator from Texas mischaracterizes the property sales process, grossly overstates the willingness of RTC to give price concessions and fabricates a completely arbitrary price tag of $10.5 billion for these provisions.

The second provision would require the Federal Home Loan Banks to use a small portion of their net income to lower the cost of financing for homeownership and rental housing for low income and moderate income families. Each bank would contribute 5 percent of its net earning in 1990-93, 6 percent in 1994, and 10 percent in 1995 and beyond. The contributions nationwide would total not less than $50 million in 1990-93, $75 million in 1994, and $100 million in 1995 and beyond.

Those funds would be provided to member thrift institutions to write down the interest rates for some mortgages on low income and moderate income housing. The lending institution would pass the subsidy on to the borrower and would to incur a loss as a result.

Federal Home Loan Banks in Seattle, San Francisco, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, New York, and Boston all wrote to support the House provision. This approach is similar to activities these banks have carried out successfully in the past. The conference report would involve significantly lower amounts of bank funding than the House provision.

Senator GRAMM arbitrarily assumes that this provision will be in effect for 30 years without amendment and then comes up with his own price tag of $2.8 billion.

Mr. President, this country has a serious and growing problem of affordable housing. The housing problem affects young families who want to buy their first home. It affects elderly people who should be able to live with independence and dignity. And it affects low-income and moderate-income people, too many of whom are homeless or living near the brink of homelessness.

Some Senators fight tooth and nail against housing legislation. Some always have. I expect some will continue to do so.

I believe, however, that the full Senate will respond to the country's growing housing crisis and will approve major legislation to enact an effective, new national housing policy that meets the housing needs of American families.

The two housing provisions in this conference agreement are included to prevent this thrift crisis legislation from making the housing crisis worse.

At this point I ask to include a letter from the Federal Home Loan Bank Board in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEDERAL HOME LOAN BANK BOARD,
Washington, DC, July 18, 1989.

Hon. ALAN CRANSTON,
Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR CRANSTON: Over the past few months, Bank Board staff have been working with the Housing Committee staff to assist in the development of the low-income housing provisions of the FIRREA legislation. Yesterday, they were given an opportunity to review the July 16th draft of this provision, and we would like to take this opportunity to provide the conferees our suggestions concerning the latest proposal in this area.

The provisions are generally consistent with our thoughts concerning the disposition of lower priced single-family and multifamily dwellings. With about $10 billion of assets currently being liquidated by FSLIC, we are well aware of the significant costs the government incurs by holding residential real estate for excessively long periods. The holding costs of vacant single-family properties and multifamily properties with low occupancy rates are especially high. We believe that many non-profit organizations and public agencies are capable of helping to keep these properties as a valuable housing resource for the community. Consequently, we support the flexibility that will be given to the Resolution Trust Corporation in disposing of these properties at less than "appraised value"—particularly when the housing is being preserved as a low income housing resource.

We have identified three areas where the conferees might wish to make refinements to the legislation:

(1) Scope of Applicability of the Provision: As the provision is currently drafted, it would only apply to real estate RTC owns in its corporate capacity or as receiver. It would not apply to the portfolio of assets FSLIC currenty owns in its corporate capacity or as custodian for the institutions placed into receivership prior to January 1, 1989. Under the House and Senate passed bills, "old" FSLIC assets (those acquired prior to January 1, 1989) would revert to the FSLIC Resolution Fund within FDIC. The committee should apply the low income housing provision to the FSLIC Resolution Fund as well as the RTC.

(2) Recapture Provision: The draft proposal is silent as to whether the RTC is authorized to take measures to recapture a portion of the sales discount when the initial purchaser sells the property to a third party. In the case of deeply discounted sales, the Conferees may wish to consider giving the RTC the explicit authority to take back "soft second" mortgages for the difference between appraised value and the discounted sale price. These mortgages would not charge interest and would be repaid with the proceeds from the sale of the property.

(3) National Low Income Housing Advisory Board: The RTC provision in the House Bill contemplates the creation of Regional Advisory Boards that would be sensitive to the low income housing needs in certain geographic areas. The draft proposal does not address the role such boards might play with regard to the low income housing provisions. We would recommend that a National Low Income Housing Advisory Board be created that would advise the RTC Oversight Board and the FSLIC Resolution Fund as to the implementation of policies and programs for the sale of properties under this program. This board might consist of the Secretary of HUD, the Chairman of the Board of FNMA, the Chairman of the Board of FHLMC, the Chairman of the Office of Thrift Supervision, a member of the public representing low income housing funds, a member of the public representing non-profit housing organizations, and a member of the public representing public agencies. Public members of the board would be appointed by the RTC Oversight Board.

We would like to conclude by commending the conferees on this proposal. With the minor refinements outlined above, we believe that it will evolve to a workable and sound program.

Sincerely,

M. DANNY WALL,
Chairman.
LAWRENCE J. WHITE,
Board Member.

QUALIFIED THRIFT LENDER TEST

Mr. SHELBY. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Banking Committee to clarify the application of the new qualified thrift lender test. The bill revises the test and the definition of qualified thrift investments. Under the new test, qualified thrift investments include loans made to purchase, refinance, construct, improve, or repair domestic residential housing. I am interested in what happens when a thrift institution in a locality with insufficient demand for mortgages lends money to a mortgage company for use in making mortgages in other localities, the mortgage company uses the entire proceeds of the loan to make new mortgage loans to purchase, refinance, construct, improve, or repair homes, and the thrift institution receives back a note secured by those mortgage loans. Is it true that the thrift institution's loan to the mortgage company is a qualified thrift investment because it is made to purchase, refinance, construct, improve, or repair domestic residential housing?

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator is correct, so long as the borrower is a mortgage company and the proceeds are used only as the Senator has just described. But the loan would not be a qualified thrift investment if the borrower were a different kind of company or if proceeds were used for other purposes.

ABILITY OF BANKS TO UNDERWRITE AND DEAL IN REFCORP BONDS

Mr. KERRY. It is my understanding that the characterization of Refcorp bonds as securities subject to the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933 shall in no way affect their characterization as securities which banks may underwrite and deal in for purposes of section 16 of the National Bank Act.

Mr. RIEGLE. The Senator's understanding is correct.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, let me elaborate on what I consider to be some of the more significant features of the conference report on the Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act of 1989.

TOUGH CAPITAL STANDARDS

The bill requires the Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision to establish three capital standards: a leverage limit of not less than 3 percent; a tangible capital requirement of not less than 1.5 percent; and a risk-based capital requirement. Each of these standards must be no less stringent than the corresponding standard applicable to national banks.

There is a special rule for purchased mortgage servicing rights, which must meet standards no less stringent than those applicable to State nonmember banks and except for the amount that may be included in calculating capital, the standards applicable to national banks. In addition, the FDIC will set a percentage limit on the amount of purchased mortgage servicing rights that savings associations may use to satisfy the tangible capital requirement. The FDIC has full discretion in setting that percentage: it may range from zero to 100 percent, and may be more stringent than the capital standards applicable to State nonmember banks. The thrift regulator's capital standards may prescribe a lower, but not a higher, percentage limit than that set by the FDIC.

The bill does not permit retained and contributed mortgage servicing rights to be included in calculating capital.

The bill refrains from attempting to micromanage the risk-weighting of particular types of assets, such as FSLIC notes or purchased mortgage servicing rights. The conferees did not adopt the House provisions that had attempted to specify the risk-weight of certain assets. In addition, the capital standards have to be based on uniform accounting standards.

There has been some confusion over what will count as core capital. "Qualifying supervisory goodwill" is defined as "supervisory goodwill" in existence on April 12, 1989. The definition of supervisory goodwill that was in the House bill was not adopted in the statutory language approved by the conferees. The conference report requires that capital standards include the relevant substantive definitions of the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency [OCC]. Supervisory goodwill under the OCC capital standard means goodwill created "in connection with supervisory mergers with problem or failed depository institutions." Thus, goodwill created in other types of mergers is not counted in core capital.

RESOLUTION TRUST CORPORATION

The Resolution Trust Corporation will be responsible for disposing of thrifts with assets of between $300 billion and $500 billion. Given the size of the task and the potential for fraud and scandal inherent in an asset disposition assignment of this magnitude, we felt it was necessary to add safeguards to the administration's original proposal. First, the RTC must adopt conflict-of-interest rules no less stringent than those adopted by the FDIC. Second, the oversight board must develop guidelines to avoid the type of political favoritism that has lately gone on at HUD, and must report to Congress its development of those guidelines. Third, every person acting on behalf of the RTC, including independent contractors, will be subject to the Federal bribery statute that governs the conduct of Federal employees. Fourth, the chief executive officer, or the head operating agent, will be forbidden to go to work for anyone dealing with RTC for a year after his or her term at RTC ends. Finally, any person who is the functional equivalent of an employee of RTC or the oversight board will be subject to the full range of criminal sanctions in the Ethics in Government Act.

To permit adequate review of the RTC, the conference bill subjects it to the Freedom of Information Act. The conference bill also includes a specific section that requires the RTC to publish its agreements with entities that acquire thrifts unless the oversight board makes a unanimous decision to withhold part of such information to protect the public interest. In any event, such agreements will be available to Congress. The oversight board must appear before Congress every 6 months to explain its actions and conduct at least four open meetings per year. Further, the GAO will have full authority to obtain and review documents used by RTC or its agents.

CURBS ON EXCESSIVE RISK-TAKING BY STATE-CHARTERED THRIFTS

An enormous percentage of the losses in the thrift industry is attributable to excessive risk taking by State-chartered thrift institutions. Two States alone—California and Texas—contributed a staggering 71 percent of total FSLIC resolution costs in 1988.

Let me briefly describe some of the measures included in the conference report that will help ensure that the Federal Deposit Insurance System will never again be forced to underwrite excessive risk taking by State-chartered thrifts. At the heart of these measures is a new section 28 of the Federal Deposit Insurance Act, which has four key provisions: first, a general rule relating to State-authorized activities that are not permissible for a Federal savings association; second, a modified version of that rule applicable when the only difference between State and Federal powers is that a State savings association may engage in a greater amount of a given activity than can a Federal savings association; third, a prohibition against equity investments that are not permissible for a Federal savings association; and fourth, a prohibition against investing in corporate debt securities not of investment grade—commonly known as junk bonds. The rationale for section 28 is set forth at length in the Senate Banking Committee's report on S. 774. The conference in no way weakened section 28 as passed by the Senate, and the provisions dealing with junk bonds were markedly strengthened.

1. GENERAL RULE

Subsection (a) prohibits a State savings association from engaging as principal, after January 1, 1990, in any type of activity that is not permissible for a Federal savings association unless both parts of the following two-part test are satisfied:

First, the FDIC has determined that the activity in question would pose no significant risk of loss to the deposit insurance fund of which the savings association is a member.

Second, the savings association has enough capital to meet the fully phased-in capital standards prescribed under section 5(t) of the Home Owners' Loan Act.

The test of a significant risk of loss to the deposit insurance fund is not the relative or absolute size of the potential loss, but whether there is a significant risk that the insurance fund will suffer any loss whatever if State savings associations engage in the activity. By requiring the FDIC to determine whether a State-authorized activity poses any such risk of loss, subsection (a) compels the FDIC to take direct responsibility for permitting any State savings association to exercise, as principal, any powers broader than those of a Federal savings association.

The "fully phased-in capital standards" are those that will apply after all phase-in periods relating to capital have expired.

Subsection (a) does not apply to activities that a savings association engages in strictly as its customer's agent. This is the effect of the subsection's references to engaging in activities as principal. Agency activities could, however, be restricted under other provisions of law, such as those authorizing the FDIC to prohibit any activity found to pose a serious threat of loss to the deposit insurance fund.

2. DIFFERENCES OF MAGNITUDE

Subsection (b) applies when an activity is permissible for a Federal savings association and a State savings association seeks to engage in that acitivity in an amount greater than that permissible for a Federal savings association. Under subsection (b), the State savings association may engage in that higher amount of the activity so long as both parts of the following two-part test are satisfied: First, the FDIC has not determined that engaging in that higher amount of the activity would pose any significant risk of loss to the deposit insurance fund; and second, savings association has enough capital to meet the fully phased-in capital standards prescribed under section 5(t) of the Home Owner's Loan Act.

Subsection (b) does not apply to commercial real-estate loans, which are governed by subsection (a).

3. PROHIBITION ON EQUITY INVESTMENTS

Effective as soon as the bill becomes law, subsection (c) prohibits a State savings association from acquiring or retaining any equity investment of a type or in an amount that is not permissible for a Federal savings association to acquire and retain directly. The prohibition applies to equity investments in real estate, investments in equity securities, and any other equity investment. In applying subsection (c), Federal regulators should look to the substance of the investment and not merely to the form. Any transaction that is in substance an equity investment is covered by subsection (c), even if the transaction is nominally a loan or other permissible transaction.

There is a limited exception for shares of service corportions. Such shares must, however, meet a two-part test similar to that in subsection (a) if either first, the aggregate amount of the savings association's investment in service corporations exceeds that permissible for a Federal savings association; or, second, the service corporation engages in any activity that is not permissible for a service corporation of a Federal savings association.

A State savings association must divest itself of any equity investment that is not permissible either for a Federal savings association directly or under the exception for shares of service corporations. Any such investment must be divested as quickly as can be prudently done, as determined by the FDIC, and in any event not later than July 1, 1994. No such investment may be acquired after the bill becomes law.

4. JUNK BONDS

Subsection (d) prohibits a savings association or its subsidiaries from acquiring or retaining any corporate debt security that, at the time of acquisition, is not rated in one of the four highest rating categories by at least one nationally recognized statistical rating organization. A transition rule provides that any such security held when the bill becomes law must be divested as quickly as can be prudently done (as determined by the FDIC) consistent with safety and soundness and in light of relevant market conditions, and in any event not later than July 1, 1994. No such securities may be acquired after the bill becomes law, other than by an affiliate (or in the case of a mutual savings association, a separately capitalized subsidiary). Affiliates must by definition be separately capitalized, and appropriate firewall protections will apply under other provisions of law, such as section 23A of the Federal Reserve Act.

5. COMMERCIAL REAL-ESTATE LENDING

Section 301 of the bill substantially restricts the authority of Federal savings associations to engage in commercial real-estate lending. The limit on such lending is changed from 40 percent of assets to four times capital. The Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision may make case-by-case exceptions to the new limit, but such exceptions should not be granted until there is experience with the new requirement. Moreover such exceptions should be granted only in strict conformity with the statutory requirements, should be granted only in strict conformity with the statutory requirements, should be granted only to savings associations that are very well capitalized, and even then—as is made clear in the Senate Banking Committee's report on S. 774—should be granted only sparingly. The Director should also be vigilant against efforts to evade the new limit by characterizing what is in substance a commercial real-estate loan as some other type of loan or investment.

The new limit does not require any existing loan to be divested. In addition, there is a transition rule providing a more lenient standard under which the Director may permit a savings association to exceed the new limit until June 1, 1991.

6. NO BROADENING OF SERVICE CORPORATION ACTIVITIES

The reenactment of section 5(c) of the Home Owners' Loan Act in no way impairs the current restrictions on the activities of any service corporation of a Federal savings association, which were well expressed in the conference report on the Garn-St Germain Act of 1982. Those restrictions continue in full force.

7. ACTIVITIES INCOMPATIBLE WITH DEPOSIT INSURANCE

The Senate and House bills each contained two provisions giving the FDIC discretionary authority to restrict risky activities of savings associations. One provision appeared as section 222(4) of the Senate bill and section 219(5) of the House bill. The other appeared as section 402(e) of both bills. Both provisions now appear in section 221(4) of the conference report, which adds a new section 18(m)(3) to the Federal Deposit Insurance Act. The two provisions are independent grants of authority. Thus, for example, the FDIC can act under section 18(m)(3)(C) without regard to the limitations in section 18(b)(3)(A).

QUALIFIED THRIFT LENDER TEST

The qualified thrift lender test in this bill is a direct and pointed response to how FSLIC has construed the QTL test enacted in the Competitive Equality Banking Act of 1987. In a number of different instances FSLIC has weakened the test by interpretation. Thus the current test, as construed by FSLIC, gives QTL credit for assets that have little to do with residential mortgage lending, such as brokered deposits in other thrift institutions, offices—no matter how lavish, and regardless of whether the office has anything to do with residential mortgage lending; corporate jets used by thrift executives; equity investments in real estate, including raw land zoned for residential use; credit card debt used to buy items for the home; and other assets that FSLIC's staff regards as housing-related.

In addition, thrift institutions are allowed to use different accounting for the numerator of the QTL test—qualified thrift investments—than for the denominator. Some assets that have appreciated in value are included in the numerator at historic cost. Intangible assets and leasehold improvements are included in the numerator but not in the denominator. Likewise, the assets of subsidiaries are included in the numerator but not in the denominator. This inconsistent accounting has the effect of watering down the QTL test.

Moreover, under FSLIC's regulations, thrift institutions must meet the current test on only 18 days out of every 3 years. This infrequent averaging facilitates manipulation.

The new QTL test makes a clean sweep of these and other lenient interpretations by FSLIC. Thus qualified thrift investments are specific in detail, and the test is phrased so as to prevent the inclusion of other assets by regulatory interpretation. With the exception of home-equity loans, assets must qualify according to the specific purposes for which they are used. Consistent accounting and frequent averaging are required.

The bill permits any savings association that fails to become or remain a qualified thrift lender after July 1, 1991, to requalify for treatment as a qualified thrift lender at any time. In order for such a savings association to qualify under the bill, the savings association must demonstrate that it has met both parts of the QTL definition. The savings association's qualified thrift investments must equal or exceed 70 percent of the savings association's portfolio assets, and the savings association's daily or weekly average of qualified thrift investments must have equaled or exceeded 70 percent of the appropriate average of the savings association's portfolio assets over the preceding 2-year period. Thereafter, the savings association must continue to meet the QTL requirements for each subsequent 2-year period.

Under the bill, a savings association that fails to remain a qualified thrift lender after having requalified immediately becomes subject to restrictions on branching, activities, dividends, and Federal home loan bank advances, and any company that controls such a savings association becomes subject to the requirements of the Bank Holding Company Act and all other statutes applicable to bank holding companies. These restrictions and requirements apply to savings associations that fail the QTL test after having requalified without the 1-year or 3-year delay that otherwise would apply to certain of these restrictions.

Neither the revision of the current QTL test nor the enactment of the new QTL test will affect the status of savings associations that fail to become or remain qualified thrift lenders prior to July 1, 1991. Any savings association that fails to become or remain a qualified thrift lender under the current test will be subject to the applicable restrictions and requirements—including the more stringent penalties that will take effect 1 year after the bill becomes law—as if the applicable waiting period for those restrictions and requirements had begun when the savings association failed the current QTL test.

Qualified thrift investments include so-called mortgage-backed securities if the securities are backed by mortgages on domestic residential housing or manufactured housing. The provision regarding mortgage-backed securities is phrased so as to exclude other types of securities, including securities backed by loans on commercial property or any other property except domestic residential real housing or manufactured housing, and derivative mortgage-related securities that are created by disaggregating and repackaging the cash-flows received as interest payments on mortgages or traditional mortgage-backed securities.

CONSUMER PROVISIONS

I am particularly pleased that the conference report contains several provisions of great importance to consumers. The recapitalization of the savings and loan industry is going to cost American taxpayers a great deal of money. We don't discriminate when we collect taxes, so we should make sure that we don't discriminate when it comes to giving American citizens access to credit for home mortgages. These amendments will help provide more reliable information to the public and thereby ensure that the banks and thrifts of tomorrow will have strong policies to combat discrimination and redlining.

1. AMENDMENTS TO THE COMMUNITY REINVESTMENT ACT

The conference report would amend the Community Reinvestment Act to require disclosure of CRA ratings and reports. These amendments are designed to help put teeth into CRA enforcement by increasing the accountability of regulators for the ratings they give to individual institutions. The amendments should give communities an informed view of how well particular institutions are meeting local credit needs.

Out of concern that some avenue should remain for confidential communication between CRA examiners and the institutions they examine, the amendments provide that CRA evaluations should have a confidential section. The amendments permit disclosure of that confidential section, in whole or part, to the institution. It is critical to the success of these amendments that the provision governing the content of the confidential section of the evaluation and disclosure of the confidential section to the institution be construed narrowly, as noted in the conference report.

2. AMENDMENTS TO THE HOME MORTGAGE DISCLOSURE ACT

Periodically, evidence has been brought to the attention of the Senate Banking Committee demonstrating that it is harder for black and hispanic families to get a home loan than it is for their white neighbors. The allegations of discrimination in home mortgage lending may or may not be true, but we have never had the means to intelligently test their validity.

The conference report includes amendments to the Home Mortgage Disclosure Act that will result in collection of the kind of data necessary to determine the extent of discrimination in home mortgage lending. The amendments have nothing to do with credit allocation. They do not punish anybody. They simply require all lenders to disclose certain data with respect to their mortgages and mortgage applications. And they require each of the Federal banking regulatory agencies to analyze that data to show where discriminatory lending patterns exist.

For some time, the Federal Home Loan Bank Board has been requiring 3,100 thrifts to report the same kind of information. These amendments will level the playing field by subjecting banks and mortgage bankers to the same kind of disclosure. Under Regulation B—promulgated under the Equal Credit Opportunity Act—lenders already collect the information that will be required by these amendments, but there is no mechanism for reporting the data to a central location where it can be aggregated and analyzed. As a result, past studies of redlining or racial discrimination in mortgage lending have been incomplete and based upon inferences about particular neighborhoods.

These amendments will provide a more accurate picture of lending patterns and the underlying reasons for denial of credit. To accomplish that end, the conference bill would give lenders an opportunity to submit written explanations or additional data that explain any distortions in the reported lending patterns.

The disclosure requirements of these amendments will apply only to home mortgage lending, and the new reporting requirements imposed by these amendments will not apply to dispository institutions with less than $30 million in assets.

CREATION OF THE FEDERAL HOUSING FINANCE BOARD

The administration's original proposal placed the credit allocation function of the Federal Home Loan Bank System under the control of the Treasury Department. When the committee took up the matter, we decided that Treasury control over the Federal Home Loan Banks was undesirable because of the potential for interference with the system's mission of supporting home mortgage lending. The principal function of thrifts has been to make loans secured by single family residences. The Federal Home Loan Bank System was designed to support this function.

The conference report allows federally insured banks and credit unions to become Federal Home Loan Bank members. This was done in recognition of the fact that some financial institutions that do not have thrift charters have nonetheless demonstrated substantial commitment to providing mortgage credit to purchasers of single family residences. There are other factors that could increase the amount of residential mortgage lending by non-thirft institutions. For example, the risk-based capital standards require financial institutions to hold less capital for home mortgage loans than for commercial loans. Thus, it is possible that existing financial institutions could seek to restructure their balance sheets to make their portfolio more closely resemble a traditional thrift.

Originally, the Senate bill required a bank or credit union to pass the qualified thrift lender [QTL] test in order to gain access to advances from a Federal Home Loan Bank. This would have required a bank to fund 100 percent of its new single family mortgage lending without any help from a Federal Loan Bank. Once it reached the QTL plateau, it could use advances from the Federal Home Loan Bank for additional residential mortgage lending. The conference report allows insured banks and credit unions to have access to loans from the Federal Home Loan Banks under certain conditions. Generally, new members must have demonstrated a substantial commitment to residential mortgage lending. If a member is not a qualified thrift lender, it must hold additional stock in its Federal Home Loan Bank. All advances or extensions of credit by the Federal Home Loan Banks must be secured by eligible collateral.

We thought it made sense to give banks and credit unions that plan to increase their mortgage lending some help along the way. But first, the bank or credit union must take a small step on its own. Thus, under the conference report, any such institutions that have 10 percent of their total assets in residential mortgage loans will have access to Federal Home Loan Bank advances. Importantly, the conference report retains the requirement of existing law that a potential Federal Home Loan Bank member must demonstrate that "the character of its management and its home-financing policy are consistent with sound and economical home financing." As we explained in the manager's report, this test is not subsumed in the 10 percent test. It is an independent test that requires evidence of a commitment that will eventually reach thrift-like levels for originating and holding mortgage loans secured by single family residences.

The new agency responsible for overseeing this system, the Federal Housing Finance Board must adopt meaningful methods to keep the Federal Home Loan Banks focused on this housing finance mission.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS PROVISIONS

Section 212 of the conference bill provides for extended statute of limitations periods for claims brought by the FDIC in its capacity as conservator or receiver of a failed financial institution. Although these provisions have attracted little attention from the media, they are of the utmost importance. Extending these limitations periods will significantly increase the amount of money that can be recovered by the Federal Government through litigation, and help ensure the accountability of the persons responsible for the massive losses the Government has suffered through the failures of insured institutions. The provisions should be construed to maximize potential recoveries by the Federal Government by preserving to the greatest extent permissible by law claims that would otherwise have been lost due to the expiration of hitherto applicable limitations periods. See Electrical Workers v. Robbins & Myers, Inc., 429 U.S. 229, 243 (1976); Chase Securities Corp. v. Donaldson, 325 U.S. 304, 311–16 (1946).

LOANS TO ONE BORROWER

The bill generally makes savings associations subject to the statutory limits on loans to one borrower that apply to national banks. In determining whether a savings association complies with the statutory limits applicable to national banks, the Director of the Office of Thrift Supervision will be bound by the regulations, rulings, and other interpretations of the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency, including definitions. The bill permits the Director to impose more stringent standards, but not to abridge the application to savings associations of the national bank limits.

CONCLUSION

Notwithstanding the reservations I have set forth in a previous statement, I am proud of this bill. It is no masterpiece and there are no guarantees that it will permanently solve the thrift crisis. Nevertheless, it represents a tough, comprehensive response to an urgent need, and Congress and the American public should take pride in that. It deserves to become law, and I urge my colleagues to lend it their support.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, last January 31, in a speech on the Senate floor, I set out six principles that I thought should guide our resolution of the crisis in our savings and loan industry. I thought then, and I continue to believe now, that any thrift legislation we enact will only work if:

First, it is cost-effective. The sums involved in resolving the thrift crisis are staggering. We need a solution that attempts to minimize costs. If we borrow money to finance a solution, therefore, as we must, interest costs must be held to the absolute minimum;

Second, as much of the financing as possible comes from the savings and loan industry. It is the Savings and Loan Insurance Fund that is in trouble and the savings and loan industry must therefore do everything it can to restore the fund;

Third, it does not create potential new problems;

Fourth, it goes after those whose negligence and criminal behavior contributed to this problem. Some savings and loan executives treated their thrifts like they were Atlantic City casinos. Others were nothing more than thieves. They must be prosecuted to the full extent of the law. Legislation must ensure that they are not permitted to profit from their greed, their negligence, or their criminal behavior;

Fifth, it contains the kind of reforms necessary to ensure that we are never faced with this kind of problem again. This means raising thrift capital standards to the bank level; they are currently only half the bank level, and over half the industry doesn't even meet these lower standards. This means separating FSLIC from the Home Loan Bank Board to eliminate the conflict between the Board's role to promote the thrift industry and FSLIC's role as insurer. This means the kind of regulatory reform that will rein in the kind of excessive risk-taking we have seen; and Sixth, it is on-budget. I think we undermine our own credibility and the budget process if we spend perhaps $110 billion or more over the next 3 years without including those sums in the budget. If the budget process is to work, if we are ever to eliminate the persistent budget deficits, we need to be honest and face the full extent of our budget problems.

This is too much money to try to hide; and hiding it off-budget destroys the integrity of our budget process.

I would like to be able to say that the conference report before us now meets all of the objectives I laid out in January, but I cannot. While the conference report meets some of the objectives, it falls short in a number of important respects.

Tragically, there is real doubt that the conference report is structured in a way that minimizes taxpayer risk and ensures that we will not have to face this problem again.

It does not provide enough money to fully resolve the problems now outstanding. In fact, the bill may be as much as 50 percent short of what is needed. Further, it does not sufficiently recapitalize the Thrift Insurance Fund, which will now be known as SAIF, even though that is absolutely essential to handle any future problems as they arise.

Frankly, I do not blame the conferees for this problem. Instead, I think we are facing this situation because the administration is more interested in squeaking through this budget year than it is in adequately financing the solution to the Thrift Industry Insurance Fund crisis.

Because the financing in the bill is inadequate, the Senate and House Banking Committee's have been under a lot of pressure to design the regulatory reforms in a way that minimizes the risk that we will have to return to this issue in a few years to provide additional financial assistance.

I think that the bill reported by the Senate Banking Committee, while far from perfect, was sensitive to this issue, and attempted to handle the essential regulatory reforms in a reasonable and appropriate way. However, the conference product does not seem to recognize the relationship between the regulatory reforms and the financing needs as clearly as the Senate Banking Committee's bill did.

Let there be no mistake. I strongly support moving the thrift industry to bank capital standard. I think the only sensible course is to move risky activities that should not be protected by deposit insurance from the thrift to separately capitalized subsidiaries. It is long past time to raise the fire walls that separate thrifts from their affiliates to levels comparable to those that govern the banking industry.

The heart of the conference bill is the capital standard. I share the view that thrifts should have real capital—tangible capital—in amounts identical to the levels banks have to maintain. There are basically only two ways for the banks to raise that capital: either from their profits or from the financial markets. In fact, the truth is that there is only one way for thrifts to raise capital—from their profits—because no investors will risk their money in any enterprise unless they think that enterprise will produce profits.

Frankly, I think that the conference bill, in its understandable eagerness to stop the abuses that have been found in the thrift industry has made it more difficult than necessary for thrifts to attract that capital the bill mandates that they raise. I share the view of the conferees that no thrift should be allowed to bet the Federal Insurance Fund by making risky investments without adequate capital.

Again, I agree that, in some cases, only 100 percent capital, in a separately capitalized affiliate, is the only way to go. I am concerned, however, that while we have prevented thrifts from "betting the ranch," we have also gone too far in impairing their profitability.

A story in last Saturday's New York Times entitled, "Some Risks Seen in Savings Bailout Bill" makes the point. The story states: "The bailout of the savings and loan industry that a House-Senate conference committee agreed on Thursday may in the end hurt the healthy institutions the legislation is intended to protect, industry experts and some regulators are warning. These experts say the amendments added to the bill may limit the profit potential of many strong savings and loan associations * * *."

In my view, the bill also makes it more difficult for capital-impaired but safely operated marginal institutions to regain their profitability. The same factors that adversely affect the strong institutions also hurt the well-run marginal institutions, and the marginal institutions face additional impediments in the conference report that further add to their difficulties in attracting capital.

There are clearly some marginal institutions that cannot make it and which should not be allowed to try. However, there are other institutions which can come back if they have a real opportunity. Unnecessarily closing these institutions puts an unjust burden on American taxpayers.

The most certain solution is to close every marginal institution. However, the bill does not have anywhere near enough funds to do that. Further, as a practical matter, the regulators simply do not have the capacity to close all marginal institutions simultaneously. Therefore, there is no way to avoid letting some marginal institutions continue to operate for at least some considerable period of time.

Given these facts, the bill should have been constructed to minimize the risk of letting the good marginal institutions continue operations. Instead, however, the bill has the effect, though that is not its intention, of adding to the likelihood that we will need additional public funds because it goes too far in impairing the profitability of marginal thrifts that are safely operated but which need to raise capital.

This legislation takes the Texas and California problems, and the causes of those problems, as if they were blueprint for thrifts across the Nation. However, the Texas blueprint does not fit well everywhere.

Not all thrifts got into trouble by high-flying, "bet the ranch"-type activities. Many thrifts got into trouble in the early 1980's because their cost of deposits went above the return they were earning on solid, but low-yielding mortgages. Perhaps the Federal Home Loan Bank Board should have closed these institutions years ago. However, in many cases, it did not, and some of these institutions are now on their way back.

We are now putting up cash instead of continuing the forbearance that characterized the Home Loan Bank Board's actions in the early 1980's. However, we still cannot afford not to give solid but marginally capitalized thrifts a real chance to succeed. As I said before, we don't have enough cash. We need tough supervision; we need to be prudent, but we must also be prudent with the taxpayers' money. Because this bill goes too far in impairing thrift profitmaking potential, it does not meet this test.

Finally, I want to say a word about the on-budget issue. Although I have supported on-budget financing of the thrift insurance fund recapitalization from the beginning, I voted against the on-budget approach in committee, when the bill was first before the Senate, and when the conference report was before the Senate yesterday. I did so for three simple reasons:

First, the President is adamantly opposed to the on-budget approach;

Second, the budget resolution we have agreed to for fiscal year 1990 does not leave room for the on-budget approach; and Third, the first priority must be to enact the bill as quickly as possible.

Now we have a compromise before us, one that I understand the administration can support, and one that does not require us to redo the entire Federal budget for fiscal year 1990.

This compromise makes it possible for us to enact the conference report, and I recognize that this legislation must be enacted—now. I therefore will not object to the action the Senate is taking tonight. I want to make it clear, however, that the bill's flaws make it impossible for me to support it. Were a rollcall vote required, I would reluctantly have to vote "no."

THE FSLIC BAILOUT BILL IS DISHONEST AND UNNECESSARILY EXPENSIVE

Mr. KOHL. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the conference report. The bill is fundamentally dishonest and will cost the American taxpayers billions of dollars more than necessary.

For years, problems in the thrift industry were ignored, minimized, and hidden. That terrible series of mistakes brings us to this moment.

Had we taken quick action, the cost would have been $10 billion, not the $300 billion it will cost us today.

Had we taken quick action, our savings and loan industry would not have experienced the deposit drain of the past 2 years.

Had we taken quick action, healthy thrifts such as those in my State would not be forced to pay exhorbitant insurance premiums.

But, Mr. President, we chose to sweep this problem under the rug.

When we tried to hire more bank examiners, the Reagan administration said "no."

When we tried to provide more money for closing thrifts, the Reagan administration said "no."

And, when regulators tried to rein in irresponsible thrift executives, the Reagan administration and Members of Congress said "no."

This is a sorry story. There is blame enough for everyone at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue and at the Bank Board. But fingerpointing can wait for another day. What we need now is quick action to clean up this mess in the cheapest way possible.

We have no choice but to pay the depositors at the insolvent thrifts. The entire financial industry depends on the Federal Government standing behind its pledge to insure all deposits. Paying off those deposits will cost at least $150 billion.

Mr. President, the question is not whether we will spend the money. Instead, the question is how will we raise the money we need.

Unfortunately, the plan before us chooses one of the worst, most costly ways possible. It demonstrates that we have not learned a single lesson from our past and I therefore cannot support the bill.

Exactly how would the bill finance the bailout? At President Bush's insistence and over the objections of a majority in the Senate, the proposal will borrow $30 billion through an off-budget agency at higher interest rates than necessary and borrow another $20 billion during the current fiscal year so that it will not be subject to the Gramm-Rudman restrictions.

This is precisely the kind of smoke and mirrors that got us into trouble in the first place. While it may obscure the true extent of the problem, the only real consequence of this financing scheme is to raise the cost of the bill.

Borrowing money through the newly created off-budget agency adds billions of dollars to the total cost of the bill. That kind of money may not be much for the folks at the White House, but it's still a lot of money back in Wisconsin. It's just plain wrong to waste taxpayers money this way.

There are other problems with this bill. I was frankly willing to live with them until the administration imposed its costly financing scheme. However, with this new provision, the other problems are simply too onerous to bear.

One key question is whether the bill will provide enough money to get the job done. The $50 billion provided by the bill is probably the very minimum we will need. And, given the overly optimistic assumptions that underlie the bill on interest rates and deposit growth, there is some question as to whether the law will be able to deliver even the $50 billion it promises.

I am also not satisfied that enough guidance is given to the resolution trust corporation. The RTC will be charged with liquidating over 300 billion dollars' worth of assets seized from insolvent thrifts. The administration says the RTC will be staffed leanly. How in the world do they expect a "lean" staff to dispose of this amount of assets?

In addition, the RTC will be under pressure to raise money quickly for the bailout. If they bow to that pressure, they will be forced to dump assets on the market, depressing property values, and hurting healthy thrifts, banks, and local governments. I am sure we will have to revisit this issue very soon.

Finally, there is the issue of Danny Wall. In many ways, Chairman Wall is a man more sinned against than sinning. However, during his tenure too many of the abuses continued.

In addition, precisely when Congress most needed an honest and accurate assessment of the cost of the problem, Danny Wall lowballed his estimates. That was a critical obstacle to timely legislation. At a minimum, therefore, he should be required to go through a reconfirmation process before he assumes his new position as head of the Office of Thrift Supervision.

I recognize that the bill before us is an improvement over the legislation passed by the Senate earlier this year. It strengthens capital standards, restricts risky investments for insured deposits, revamps the regulatory structure, improves the protections against discriminatory lending, and provides funds for low-income housing. I applaud the committees for their fine work in these areas.

However, on balance, the bill as modified to comply with the administration's wishes takes the wrong approach. It tries to hide the cost of the bailout, but in reality it only raises the tab for future generations of taxpayers. We should vote this bill down and devise a more honest, less costly solution.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, first, let me say that all of us in this body should admire the determination and leadership of the chairman of the Banking Committee, my senior colleague from Michigan, DON RIEGLE. He has worked for months and months on solving this most difficult crisis in the savings and loan industry, and we owe him our sincere respect for all his efforts.

When the Senate passed this legislation in April, I voted for it even though I was troubled by the off-budget financing mechanism. I hoped that the conference would take a more forthright approach.

Yesterday, I voted to waive the Budget Act so that the conference report could at least be considered by the full Senate. That motion failed. However, in an effort to gain the administration's support, the conferees agreed last night to an approach to financing this package that I simply find unacceptable. By engaging in the shell game of putting $20 billion of this package on-budget, but in a year, fiscal year 1989, for which the Gramm-Rudman books have already closed, the conference report repeats the same kind of smoke and mirrors budgeting that has prevented us from serious deficit reduction year after year. I voted against the White House-congressional budget agreement because it contained similar sleights of hand. And it is for this reason that if there were a recorded vote on this conference report I would have voted "no."

Mr. HOLLINGS. Mr. President, my views on the conference report now before us were stated in great detail during yesterday's debate. Because of the off-budget shenanigans, and the violence it does to the truth-in-budgeting process we established with the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Deficit Reduction Act, I wish to be recorded in opposition to this bill.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. President, the bill before us is a fairly reasonable way to deal with a miserable situation. For the most part, the conferees, on behalf of the House and Senate—and indeed on behalf of the American people—have crafted a balanced plan to bail out and restructure the savings and loan industry. The differing opinions on the method to finance and rescue, the so-called on-budget and off-budget proposals have drawn the lion's share of attention, and in the end a compromise has been struck to allow passage of the bill and to initiate reforms to stop the hemorrhage of funds from failed and failing thrifts.

While I will vote for the bill, I must say that it is tough to support such an expensive bill that will yield so few benefits to my State and the New England region as a whole. Indeed, passage of this bill entails increased bank premiums and earmarked taxes that will certainly leave the State. Throughout this whole S&L debate, I have heard from outraged constituents who do not want their tax dollars used to pay this tab. I do not blame these taxpayers one bit, and I must admit that it is not easy to explain the reasons why the American taxpayers have to bite the bullet on this one. But we have known that taxpayer funds would be necessary and so I have been preparing myself to support the final package. Much of the constituent advice that I have received has come in response to my vote in favor of the original Senate plan.

Throughout this S&L debate, I have been in contact with the people in my State who run our thrifts. A more patient lot you may never see. Even as they have seen their premiums rise, their deposits fall and their reputations slandered they have shown a willingness to stay with the program and have participated in the process with suggestions aimed not at saving their pocketbooks, but aimed at saving the system so that they can continue to provide home mortgages within their communities.

Ultimately, the market will determine lending interest rates. However, by increasing the insurance premiums, this bailout puts an additional burden on thrifts that will make it more difficult for them to be competitive. Due to the fine record of Vermont thrifts, I am confident that this increased cost of business will be absorbed without detrimentally affecting them and their ability to function during periods of tightened markets.

Just to set the record straight, Vermont thrifts are among the healthiest in the Nation. We have had no defaults and will have no trouble meeting the tougher capital standards, the qualified thrift lending test and goodwill provisions of this bill because we are already there or pretty darn close. For example, Brattleboro Savings and Loan, a typical Vermont thrift, has over 85 percent of its assets in primary residential mortgages. Its net worth percentage is about 5.7 percent, and its taxable income has increased annually—even as it has seen its insurance premiums jump time and again. So this is an S&L that pays its premiums and its taxes—only to see both of these pots being tapped to close or resuscitate sister institutions thousands of miles away.

This information on Brattleboro S&L is indicative of thrifts in Vermont and New England. While our regional economy has been strong in comparison to other regions, the health of Vermont thrifts is ultimately a result of good management and diligent State regulators. I do not buy the argument that depressed economies have caused the failure of thrifts in other regions. GAO's report on "Failed Thrifts" found that "thrifts that were operated in a prudent manner have generally survived the regional economic problems."

As we all well realize, however, this line of debate is now academic. While I am pleased to see the new enforcement provisions, including $75 million annually to the Justice Department over 3 years to investigate and prosecute fraud, higher statutory penalties, new authority to seize ill gotten gains and greater powers for institution regulators, the reality is that the Justice Department will have a tough time recovering even a small fraction of the losses.

The Resolution Trust Corporation, established to sell property taken over from failed thrifts, will perhaps be able to generate a more considerable amount of money to pitch back into the system, but it is clear that the real burden for paying for this mess will fall to the taxpayers and surviving thrifts. Everyone would have hoped that more money could have been squeezed from the thrift industry, but we have sought to draw the limit without causing the system to collapse. I know that the thrifts in my State provide a valuable service in terms of lending for home purchases, and I believe that the reforms which are contained in this bill will help bring the rest of the country back in line as well.

I still have a problem with the provisions dealing with affordable housing. I say this as a long-time supporter of affordable housing legislation. I have consistently backed housing plans and other programs to assist those individuals and families who struggle to maintain an adequate standard of living—especially as they see their incomes fall in relation to cost-of-living expenses.

But I would prefer to have debated the affordable housing issue out in the open, not behind the closed-door deliberation of a must-pass bill. It seems somewhat cowardly to establish an entitlement program on the backs of regional banks, and I question whether such a proposal would fly if it were to be proposed as a free-standing bill. It's a bit worrisome to initiate a program to force local thrifts to make below-market loans on terms hammered out behind closed doors in Washington.

Mr. President, beyond the questionable wisdom of establishing a $50 to $100 million housing program within the complicated web of this massive rescue package, there is a fundamental flaw in the logic of this plan. I understood that the bill, as originally passed by the Senate, was structured to glean the maximum amount of money possible from the thrift industry without causing the system to collapse. I favored this approach, and thrifts in Vermont were willing to accept this burden, given their commitment to service in the community and their realization that funds not generated from their premiums would need to come from taxpayers who are their customers and neighbors.

Now the conference committee reports a bill to skim an additional $50 to $100 million from the regional banks. While the objective is noble, I must question the means. If we had already squeezed this industry to the maximum extent, from where does this money come? If this money is available for affordable housing, why wasn't it available to help resolve of the crisis? Closer to home, if a thrift in Vermont is already making 85 percent of its loans to local home buyers, some of these being heart loans to families on the fringe of qualifying, what sense does it make to mandate additional, arbitrary loans at the whim of Washington lawmakers?

In addition, the conference agreement allows local housing agencies the right of first refusal on property taken over by the Federal Resolution Trust Corporation. Again, this is not bad, per se, but it is of little benefit to Vermont and New England, where there are no failed thrifts and thus no repocessed property. On the other hand, by allowing special consideration in the sale of these properties, preliminary estimates predict losses of upwards of $10 billion. This money, which will benefit regions already reaping a windfall, could have been used to mitigate taxpayer costs of the bailout.

Mr. President, I favor affordable housing initiatives. But I question the wisdom of mandating untested programs in a bailout bill of such massive proportions. I had come to understand that this bill would restructure the industry to bring all member institutions back into the business of home lending. I had come to understand that the bill was structured to draw the maximum amount possible from the thrift industry to pay for the mess. The affordable housing provisions, inserted by the conference committee, jeopardize my confidence in the plan.

Mr. President, I do not wish to unduly delay implementation of a bill designed to arrest the hemorrhage of funds, currently estimated at $20 to $30 million per day, that eventually must be covered largely by taxpayer funds. Although I'm not convinced that we have not minimized the ultimate expense to the American taxpayer, the hour is late, and I fear that additional delay could run up to a billion dollars if this deal falls apart today.

I yield the floor.

Mr. BURNS. Mr. President, I rise to voice my opposition to the conference report on H.R. 1278, the savings and loan bailout bill.

Mr. President, I initially supported the Senate bill because I thought it adequately addressed a severe problem in as fair a way as possible given difficult circumstances. It was difficult for me to support this legislation given the safety and soundness of the thrift industry in Montana. The fourth strongest in the Nation. I felt, however, the severity of the problem required a quick and responsible solution. In general, the bill as reported by the Senate was a good one.

However, as is often the case Mr. President, the House of Representatives did a number on it. They have added numerous provisions that will end up costing taxpayers billions of dollars. I am referring specifically to the housing provisions. I am aware that we must do everything possible to ensure an adequate supply of housing is available to those who need it. This bill requires the twelve regional Federal home loan banks to contribute up to $100 million per year, beginning in 1995, to subsidize low income loans. Mr. President, I strongly believe these funds could be better used to add to their contribution for the entire bailout. Not using these funds ultimately increases the cost to taxpayers and places an unnecessary strain on the resources of the regional Federal home loan banks.

Mr. President, the Resolution Trust Corporation is to maximize recovery on assets it acquires. I believe property should be liquidated as soon as possible and to the highest bidder. It should not stay on the market for 90 days for certain interests to debate on whether or not they wish to make a bid. Because the RTC will be allowed to sell certain property to only two classes of eligible purchasers within a 90-day period, the costs to the Government in the form of continued maintenance, operating costs and insurance will increase substantially.

Mr. President, there are a number of reasons I oppose this bill and I have only mentioned a few. I have always sought to minimize the contribution taxpayers will have to make. For me to vote in favor of this bill would be going against my overall goal.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. MACK. Mr. President, I understand the urgency of passing this legislation in order to stop the hemorrhaging of failing savings and loans in this country. I cannot, however, support the newly compromised conference agreement as it stands. The funding provisions are still a sham—a crass defiance of Gramm-Rudman deficit discipline—and the housing provisions will cost innocent taxpayers at additional billions of dollars over the Senate passed version.

Financing $20 billion with Treasury funds that do not count on the budget for sequestration purposes in fiscal year 1989 is budget gimmickry of the first degree. Spiking the deficit after the snap-shot is taken for sequestration exploits an unfortunate loophole in the Gramm-Rudman law. Using this loophole for a $20 billion expense sets an incredibly tempting precedent for a spendthrift Congress.

The other major problems with this legislation is that it includes two housing provisions which could increase the cost of this bill to the taxpayer by $13.3 billion. These housing provisions have no business being in this already costly emergency legislation.

Repossessed properties of failed savings and loans were to be sold for the highest possible price and the money was to be used to cut the cost of closing down insolvent thrifts. The cost to the taxpayer depends directly on the price the Government gets for these repossessed properties. The conference report requires these properties to be offered to "qualifying multifamily purchasers"—in other words, the housing subsidy lobby—before they are offered for commercial sale. Limiting the size of the market of those who can bid on the properties and authorizing them to be sold at below-market prices will boost the amount to be paid by the innocent taxpayer. Each 1 percent reduction in the price of these properties will cost taxpayers roughly $1 billion.

The other provision in the conference report skims an additional $2.8 billion from the S&L industry and earmarks it for a new housing subsidy managed by the regional Federal Home Loan Banks. This cost places an additional burden on the already distressed S&L industry and does not ease the cost to the taxpayer by 1 penny.

These provisions raise the cost of this legislation to the taxpayer and place additional burdens on an already overburdened industry trying to recover. They have no business being included in this emergency legislation.

For these reasons I cannot support the conference agreement.

Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this far reaching bill has many admirable qualities such as:

Tough new capital and regulatory standards for thrifts to guard against future losses. The bill will require thrifts to meet the same capital standards as national banks.

New increased civil penalties and enforcement provisions to prosecute those who are to blame for a huge costly mess;

More restrictive lending limits on thrifts to halt runaway lending;

Increased insurance premiums on thrifts to make sure that the industry pays its fair share of the cost of this problem;

New formalized appraisal standards to protect against fraud;

Separating the insurance and regulatory oversight functions to remove the inherent conflict of interest within the thrift regulatory process;

Restrictions on thrift investment powers;

Providing $50 billion to close down the brain dead thrifts whose tab is now running at $20 million a day; and Provides three new housing programs for low- and moderate-income families.

Still, there are many problems in this bill. Whenever there are attempts to completely overhaul an industry—as the administration does in this bill—there are going to be problems that one can and cannot anticipate. The following problems are the ones that concern me the most while I am not ignoring the many other lesser ones in the bill.

FUNDING

The key feature of contention in the bill has been which funding mechanism is the cheapest and best suited to protect the taxpayer. Under the Bush off-budget proposal, the savings industry would finance the principal of the $50 billion, while the Treasury would pay more of the interest. Others have proposed putting all the funds on-budget with funds raised by Government bonds. I originally supported an off-budget approach as I believed it created less problems. While many argue that the on-budget approach would save money, it was not clear that the taxpayer would realize any savings with the on-budget choice and belaboring this issue on the floor of the Senate would delay the bill, further diminishing any savings that could be realized by the on-budget process.

The conferees decided upon a compromise funding approach which is a combination of both off- and on-budget funding. This agreed compromise solution is very close to the proposals Congressman WYLIE and I made several days ago in the conference. In 1989, $20 billion will be added on the budget and the remainder of $30 billion will be raised off budget in 1990–91. I supported this approach as a reasonable compromise to break the budget deadlock with the House and I believe that it is a more workable approach than either the off- or on-budget process. Putting funds from the Treasury in the 1989 budget will make funds available much more quickly to resolve the 1988–89 insolvencies and to cover the administrative costs because the FDIC will not have to wait for the Treasury to raise funds by selling bonds.

In any event, it's probable that more funds will be needed in the near term to address the thrift problem than are provided for in this bill. The financial projections as to the ability of the thrifts to contribute to the funding cost and the carrying charges on the $50 billion in borrowing are based on highly unrealistic economic projections put forward by the administration. The economy is running far below the administration's assumptions, leading one to conclude that new funds will be needed in the near future.

A RESTRICTED CHARTER

One of the most troublesome problems to me in the bill is the restricted qualified thrift lender test. This test is used to keep thrifts in home lending. The present law requires thrifts to have 60 percent of their portfolio in home mortgages. Now, there has been no problem with this test, nor has it been shown that the test was or considered to be a contributing factor to the thrift crises. Yet both Houses of Congress have made extensive changes in the test; each one attempting to take the thrift industry back to the time when they only made mortgages.

I find the mood of Congress to exchange the problems of the late 1980's—undercapitalized, poorly run thrift institutions with poor quality loans—for the problems of the early 1980's—money-losing portfolios restricted primarily to residential mortgages—most disturbing.

If there is to be a future for the thrift industry we must encouarge investors to invest in these institutions. I fear that Congress in its zeal to cut back direct investments and high yield bonds along with the more restrictive QTL test may have severely limited the ability of thrifts to make money and attract new capital which is essential to the success of the thrift funding plan.

Overall, it is incorrect to suggest that lenders that have stayed exclusively in residential lending will not get into serious problems. Some seem to have no institutional memory of what happened to thrifts in the 1960's and 1970's, when market interest rates rose above mortgage rates and thrifts were faced with disintermediation of their mortgage portfolios as depositors moved their funds to money market competitors that could pay higher rates.

R. Dan Brumbaugh, a senior fellow at the Center for Economic Policy Research at Stanford University in his book, Thrifts Under Siege, stated that, "thrifts have lost income every year since 1982 in one area mandated by the QTL test: holding mortgages in their portfolios." Too severe restrictions on the assets of thrift portfolios in the future could be a formula for continuing disaster in the thrift industry. I would hope that the Banking Committee would continue to review the QTL as this proposal is implemented.

Of great concern to me is the Resolution Trust Corporation. This new agency will quickly become the owner of $400 billion in assets held by hundreds of sick savings and loans. It will become a giant contracting agency, mandated to unload the world's largest pool of private property—returning the proceeds to the Treasury and taxpayers to pay for the thrift problem.

The scope of the RTC's mission is breathtaking. On one hand it will be told by statute to prevent dumping properties into the already damaged local economies and at the same time to get the highest fair market value for their assets—an impossible task at best.

Never before has the United States or any private company tried to manage or attempt to sell so much private property. This agency could become fraud and waste just waiting to happen following the nightmare that has happened with the Federal Asset Disposition Association once again subjecting the taxpayer to more cost.

The two Banking Committees must oversee this agency with extreme diligence. I hereby serve notice on those who will serve in the agency, and those who will deal with it, that we can and must do exactly that.

Congress, overall, has done a good job in tightening up the bill's vague language as it was submitted by the administration.

I have both praise and concern for this bill. I congratulate my colleagues for the hard work and the time they have spent in an attempt to reach where we are today just before the final vote in the conference report on this bill. Chairman RIEGLE and his staff have done great work on the Senate side. So have Senator GARN and his staff. So have Chairman GONZALEZ and Congressman WYLIE and their staffs on the House side. So have many others. No bill is perfect. I trust this will prove to be a positive first step toward dealing with the thrift problem—a beginning not an end because I have no doubt that sooner or later we will be back to this problem.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, while there are significant differences of opinion about the provisions of this legislation, that only underscores my admiration for the leadership, dedication, and energy which the Senator from Michigan, the chairman of the Banking Committee demonstrated in guiding this legislation through its tortuous route to final passage. During our work in committee and on the floor, he was open to all views and solicitous of our concerns. In his first task as chairman, he must be applauded for his performance.

Unfortunately, not everyone's point of view can prevail. On April 18th of this year, when the Senate considered the FSLIC legislation, I detailed my strong reservations about the bill. At the time, I held some hope that my views would find their way into the final product. Unfortunately, that did not happen.

There is no question that some legislation is necessary to honor our commitment to insured depositors. Fraud, mismanagement, and bad luck have caused many thrifts to fail, unable to pay back depositors. Insured depositors must be made whole.

But that was not the only purpose of the legislation. The second purpose was to make certain that this problem never again recurred. I do not believe that this bill achieves that goal.

Given the fact that we as a nation have adopted a policy that deposits should be insured, the task of Congress is to minimize the risk to the taxpayer. That can only be done by fostering a viable, healthy thrift industry.

Every deposit in a thrift creates a debt which the institution owes to the depositors. The taxpayer guarantees payment of that debt. Thus the taxpayer has a financial interest in making sure that thrift institutions accepting insured deposits can meet their obligations. As this bill unfortunately but necessarily makes plain, unmet thrift obligations are taxpayer obligations.

I emphasize this somewhat obvious point because the citizens of this Nation, having read media reports on the thrift crisis, must be confused. The media have portrayed the problem as an adversarial context: The thrifts versus the taxpayers.

Such analysis is, of course, misleading. Some things that benefit thrifts equally benefit taxpayers. And some things don't. Recent history shows that thrift managers were investing other people's money—insured deposits—in various ventures that failed.

This bill attempts to remedy this problem with strong medicine, some good and some bad. The administration bill transmitted by President Bush to the Congress last February correctly analyzed that the vice was that managers were investing and risking other people's money rather than their own. It seems clear that managers who are required to risk their own money will act more prudently than those who enjoy the luxury of risking other people's money.

The Congress, in an effort to be even tougher than the administration, not only required thrift managers to risk their own capital but also restricted the investments that could be made by the thrift. These restrictions on investments are bad policy for two interrelated reasons: First, Congress should not micromanage investments; and second, Congress may have selected bad investments for thrifts to make.

The fact that thrifts resisted both the capital requirements and the investment restrictions is not, in itself, evidence of sound policy. Higher capital requirements are desirable not because they burden the thrift industry, but because they provide protection to the taxpayer. When investments go sour, the loss is absorbed by the thrift's capital. If there is no capital, the loss is absorbed by the deposit insurance fund. If that is depleted, the taxpayer pays. Therefore, in the scheme of things, higher capital requirements are an extra layer of protection. And even more important, higher capital requirements alter conduct. They install prudent judgment into investment decisions.

The same taxpayer benefits cannot be attributed to investment restrictions imposed on thrifts. Whether a thrift invests in consumer loans or commercial real estate makes no difference to the taxpayer. What matters to the taxpayer is that most investments be successful, lest the taxpayer be called on to pay off depositors.

The error of this legislation is that Congress deems itself able to determine what is prudent or not by whole categories of investment. The bill, in effect, states that an investment in real estate or high-yield bonds is never prudent. Conversely, the bill states that investment in home mortgages is almost always prudent. Under the bill, a thrift to be a thrift must invest 70 percent of its portfolio in housing-related assets.

This 70 percent qualified thrift lender test is considerably more restrictive than current law. It seems to suggest that the cause of the thrift problem was failure to invest heavily in home mortgages. Only in Congress could such a notion be entertained. Look at all the successful investments in other areas over the years.

Moreover, there is considerable doubt that home mortgages have been profitable for thrifts in recent years. Dan Brumbaugh, who is a senior fellow at the Center for Economic Policy Research, Stanford University, and author of "Thrifts Under Siege," has recently conducted a study and concluded that Congress is about to make a grave mistake. In his study, "Restricting the Assets of Solvent Thrifts by Narrowing the Qualified Thrift Lender Test; A Formula for Continuing Disaster," he concludes that "Thrifts have lost income every year since 1982 in the one area mandated by the QTL test: Holding mortgages in their portfolios."

If Brumbaugh is correct, the lesson is clear: Never let Congress be your investment counselor.

Another study by the National Bureau of Economic Research, conducted by N. Gregory Mankiw, Harvard economics professor, concludes that home prices in the United States will decline slowly but steadily over the next two decades, dropping 47 percent in real terms by the year 2007. Now, if this conclusion is anywhere near the mark, it is truly a disaster to place thrifts in a statutory straitjacket of home mortgage financing.

I do not know whether these studies are totally accurate. The point is that they might be. Any legislation that forces thrifts to invest so heavily in home mortgages raises grave concern. The taxpayer may once again be called on in the near future.

The thrift industry needs new capital. Correctly, the bill requires it. But where will it come from? Will volunteers come in from the sidelines when their investment choices are so limited? I fear they will not come forward in sufficient numbers.

If we want to phase out the thrift industry, I suspect that there is a kinder, gentler way to do it than to give them a fresh start but stack the deck against them. The path this legislation takes is certainly more expensive for the taxpayer.

In my view, the fundamental philosophical rationale of the reform is flawed. Investment restrictions do not attract investors. By choking off the supply of voluntary capital, the taxpayer is left to shoulder the burden of meeting depositor obligations. And that is simply the wrong answer.

Mr. President, I must also express my deep concern regarding the process the legislation selects for resolving the various problems posed by insolvent thrifts. To create a private corporation to exercise rights that belong to the United States, to empower it to make decisions that legally bind the United States, and to authorize it to handle vast sums of money and other assets that belong to the people of the United States makes me apprehensive. I would hope that the Committee on Governmental Affairs, on which I serve, would study and investigate the policy implications of this Government-sponsored enterprise. I suspect that the necessarily hurried creation of this corporation will pose administrative and legal difficulties not now foreseen.

Mr. President, when the Senate considered this legislation last April, I offered an amendment that would help resolve the thrift problem without costing any money. My amendment created a new logo for thrifts that would help restore confidence.

During this year, there have been serious outflows of deposits from thrifts because of the negative publicity surrounding the crisis. The way the bill is structured, the costs of the solution are borne by the thrift industry and by the taxpaper. To put it another way, what the industry does not pay for the taxpayer does. The major financing method of the industry's contribution is the imposition of premiums on deposits. As deposits decline, the industry contribution declines and taxpayer contributions increase.

The new logo restores confidence in thrifts by stating that "Deposits [are] "Federally insured to $100,000" and "backed by the full faith and credit of the United States Government."

It is anticipated that thrifts will not only display their logo on the window of their institutions but advertise the fact that the Government stands behind insured deposits. Moreover, now that thrifts and banks have their deposits insured by the same institution, the FDIC, the advertising wars between thrifts and banks should stop. An insured deposit in a thrift and an insured deposit in a bank are equally insured. Both are insured through the FDIC. Both are backed by the Government.

I would expect that thrifts and banks would advertise that they are insured through the FDIC, an agency of the Federal Government. That is a fact. However, any effort to imply the superiority of one insurance over the other should be viewed as deceptive. The insurance is equal.

It follows that no one should read differences into the thrift logo and the current bank logo. One says that "deposits" are insured to $100,000; the other says that "each depositor" is insured to $100,000. As the author of the amendment, I declare that absolutely no difference is intended. The reason why the new logo refers to the "deposits" rather than "each depositor" is to provide a proper subject for the additional statement on the new logo that insured deposits are "backed by the full faith and credit of the United States Government." The reason is grammatical not legal.

I am pleased that the FDIC has already prepared the new logo. It utilizes the same gold and black colors of the current bank logo. It is circular in shape, and the circle is outlined with 50 black stars. In the center is the traditional depiction of the American eagle in black outline on the gold. The required statements are superimposed with white lettering. I believe the design to be both attractive and appropriate to a financial institution. My special thanks go to the FDIC staff that labored diligently to prepare the new logo in a short time.

My amendment provides that the size of the new logo should be similar to the current FDIC logo. When I offered the amendment last April, I stated that size did not limit the shape of the logo. To clarify that further, the former wording, that the size be the same, has been changed to "similar." This should remove any question regarding the circular shape of the new logo. The requirement is that the surface area of the new logo be similar to that the current FDIC logo.

I hope that the new logo will be made available to thrifts as soon as possible. As long as deposits in thrifts are lagging, the taxpayer can be expected to pay even more. As soon as the FSLIC legislation becomes law, all must work together to restore confidence in the thrift industry. The new logo is intended to provide tangible evidence of this new dedication.

Mr. President, while there are many good things in this bill, such as stronger capital standards, they are unfortunately outweighed by the concerns I have voiced. I am concerned that the investment restrictions will slowly strangle the industry. Moreover, I am troubled by the creation of a private corporation to handle one of the most significant problems facing our Government. Therefore, I will vote "No".

Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, I rise in support of the compromise that was reached last night on the budget treatment of the FSLIC legislation. Indeed, I want to complement the Senate conferees for their efforts.

The compromise represents the best solution among the unpleasant options and divergent viewpoints that we have had before us. Obviously, in emergency legislation that is this complex, there will be much with which many of us will be unhappy.

So I think, Mr. President, that we need to look at the broader issues. I for one have always thought that the primary budget issue with FSLIC was the amount of money that we are losing every day. The estimates of that loss—that will have to be borne by the taxpayers—are as high as $30 million per day—or $1 million per hour.

Next, in choosing among the financing options, I thought that we should use the one that was least destructive to sound budgeting principles; that cost the taxpayers the least; and that would meet with bipartisan acceptance. That, of course, was easier said than done.

None of the proposals that were before us were particularly honest—there were pluses and minuses for both.

I opposed the earlier on-budget plan in the Senate because it would have meant $50 billion would be borrowed on-budget in 1989, with no assurance that the money would be spent in 1989. That would most likely have caused a sequester in 1990.

Therefore, I am pleased that in this compromise we have the assurance of the FDIC that they can actually spend $20 billion in 1989—the amount we would put on-budget.

As for the $30 billion in off-budget financing, that is a part of this compromise. I have to say I don't like it. But, at least it's $30 billion and not $50 billion.

Moreover, this compromise plan is a big improvement over the original off-budget proposal. We can close more insolvent savings and loans earlier and stop this incessant drain on the taxpayers.

Mr. President, this compromise rightly or wrongly does not contain an exemption of the FSLIC borrowing from Gramm-Rudman-Hollings. We therefore can avoid the problems and precedents that have been cited by the President, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Chairman of the Federal Reserve.

This makes this plan work on a bipartisan basis. And importantly, by putting the $20 billion on-budget in 1989, we have saved some money in the long run. And we have a quicker start at solving this crisis.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to complement and congratulate the chairman and the ranking member of the Banking Committee for their work and leadership on this bill. They've had a tough year working on this crisis, but both have performed admirably.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. RIEGLE. The conference report provides that securities issued by REFCORP shall not be exempt from the registration and reporting requirements of the Securities Act of 1933 and Securities and Exchange Act of 1934. However, the SEC has the complete authority to exempt such securities by regulation or order and should consider doing so with respect to securities issued by REFCORP.

Mr. GARN. I fully concur in Chairman RIEGLE's remarks. In addition, I believe that if REFCORP securities are not exempt from the registration and reporting requirements of the 1933 and 1934 acts, needless costs may be added to the funding program. In light of the structure of the REFCORP financing plan, under which the principal is fully secured by Treasury bonds and the interest guaranteed by the United States, registration is unnecessary for purposes of investor protection and would significantly raise the cost of issuance to the American taxpayer. Therefore, it is anticipated that the SEC will act quickly to exempt these securities.

Mr. RIEGLE. I agree that the SEC should move quickly to evaluate this situation.

Mr. GARN. Will national banks and Government securities dealers be able to deal in these securities?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes. These obligations are Government securities for purposes of the Securities and Exchange Act of 1934. In addition, these are similar to obligations issued by Federal Home Loan Banks and thus national banks should be able to underwrite and deal in these REFCORP obligations to the same extent as they can underwrite and deal in Federal Home Loan Bank obligations.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the S&L crisis is a monumental problem that will cost the taxpayers up to $250 billion over the next 30 years.

My greatest concern has been reducing the cost to the taxpayer while simultaneously providing a safe, sound thrift industry. There are some good provisions in this legislation. The strong capital standards requiring thrift managers to put up more of their own money as a buffer to protect the Federal Deposit Insurance funds and, ultimately, the American taxpayer, are a positive step.

But, let there be no mistake. There has been a heated discussion about which funding mechanism saves the taxpayers the most money. I would argue that savings are not the real issue for the sponsors of this bill. If they were, the House would not have dragged the S&L reform bill through a complex maze of congressional committees—five in all—for 4 months, while the losses in the industry piled up at the rate of $20 million per day, before finally bringing the bill to the House floor for a vote; they would not have given housing agencies the right of first refusal on the assets in the resolution trust corporation, a provision which some have estimated will cost up to $10 billion; nor would the House have voted to include a $150 million a year housing subsidy program—paid for with industry funds rather than using that same money to reduce taxpayer costs.

Mr. President, this legislation should not be used as a vehicle for pet housing projects. The American people won't stand for it, and neither will I.

I respect the Senate managers for the hard work they have done; however, I must oppose this conference report.

Mr. KERREY. Mr. President, I rise today understanding that something must be done about the crisis in our savings and loan system. The urgency to act is apparent. I am prepared to spend the funds necessary to shore up our financial system.

I am also determined to toughen the regulatory environment so that we can keep gamblers out of the thrift industry.

However, despite some improvements in the savings and loan legislation since it passed the Senate, I remain opposed to this bill. While the bill toughens the regulatory environment and prevents opportunists from using taxpayer dollars to back up speculative ventures, it has the following shortcomings:

Insufficient Accountability. There is simply not enough accountability incorporated in the resolution trust corporation established to dispose of the billions of dollars of assets. In crafting a structure, we have a responsibility as representatives and policymakers, to ensure that this entity is also politically accountable.

Regulatory Concentration. I fear that the dramatic increase of power given to the FDIC under this law will overwhelm that agency's resources and expertise. The objective of improved oversight will not be reached and we will have overachieved the objective of greater regulatory control.

Finally, in the absence of a full discussion of what is best and permanent, which this spending program—one that rivals the Marshall plan—deserves, I remain skeptical.

Again let me state clearly: I am prepared to vote for the money needed to stop the hemorrhage of losses from the savings and loan system. The American taxpayers will lose unless we do. However, I cannot support this particular legislation for the reasons stated above, especially given the potential for fraud and mismanagmeent in the RTC's operation.

Mr. President, while I feel an urgency to act to address the savings and loan crisis, I am unable to support the conference agreement. Given the recent history of savings and loans, the American people deserve more accountability to make sure this situation does not recur.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, as a member of the Banking Commttee, I cooperated in the chairman's efforts to produce a thrift bill. This legislation was necessary; and, last April when we voted, expeditious action was required because the thrift industry was losing enormous amounts of money. Therefore, the funding to close or merge these hemorrhaging institutions was a dire necessity.

As with every other major piece of legislation, we all would have written certain parts of the Senate bill differently. However, as with all legislation, expecially major legislation under emergency circumstances, much compromise has attended the road to the floor. In that context, I supported a prudent funding mechanism and regulatory reforms to clean up the fiscal debris and assure that excesses did not occur again.

As many know a terrible cost has already been visited upon the thrift industry and the American public. The Senate bill as passed last spring was designed to exact additional costs as repayment for losses and abuses and at some institutions elsewhere in the country that were beyond the control of the vast majority of good savings and loans in my State.

I supported S. 774. It contained many laudable provisions. Among these was the conversion of the Board of Freddie Mac from a governmental to a private sector orientation. With this new structure, Freddie Mac will be still better able to perform its important function as a secondary mortgage market intermediary. I am proud of the role I played in cosponsoring, with Senator CRANSTON, a provision of the Senate bill to establish an 18-member board with 13 shareholder-elected members for Freddie Mac. Furthermore, I am pleased that this provision is in the conference report.

The home mortgage lender of the future will depend even more upon an efficient and liquid secondary mortgage market. S. 774's provisions of Freddie Mac, included in the conference report, will bring still more of the genius of the free market to bear on the activities of Freddie Mac. Just as occurred last year when we caused the preferred stock of Freddie Mac to be publicly traded for the first time, the thrift industry will be made stronger, safer and sounder by privatizing the governance of Freddie Mac.

S. 774 also struck a proper balance on other difficult issues including the future role of the Federal Home Loan Bank System. I am pleased to see that the principal features of the Senate's compromise on the amount and formulation of the contribution of the home loan bank system to the financing of the Resolution Trust Corporation have survived the conference with the House. Make no mistake, Mr. President: the viability of the home loan bank system is essential to the maintenance of the availability of affordable home mortgage finance. An annual contribution of $300 million from the regional home loan banks strike a good balance between the need to find as much money within the industry as we can and still maintain the viability of the home loan bank system. I congratulate the Senate conferees on this point. I also congratulate Mr. Brian Dittenhafer, president of the Home Loan Bank of New York who, in his capacity as chairman of the conference of home loan bank presidents, worked out a difficult compromise on difficult issues that all the home loan banks could support.

On the issue of capital, the conference report contains tough new requirements that will make the thrift industry of the future safer and sounder. This is something I have always supported. But let us be honest, Mr. President, the new capital requirements will also make the thrift industry smaller.

The New York thrift industry is, by and large, healthy, conservative and well capitalized. While New York thrifts have come to expect that a certain amount of pain is to be visited upon the innocent, they also insist that the post-FIRREA environment present a level playing field in the highly competitive home mortgage lending market. I believe that S. 774 was a mild success on this point. However, I fear that the conference has resulted in overly rigid capital rules that will cause too much pain to the industry and, in the long run, to the taxpayer also.

Mr. President, during the long hearings and extensive discussions that were conducted in the Banking Committee, one point continually reappeared. In order for the rescue of the insolvent FSLIC Deposit Insurance Fund to be completed with a minimum of taxpayer funds, it was necessary to attract capital to the thrift industry. This is a simple matter, Mr. President. If thrifts are to meet their new capital standards they must raise investment capital. If they do not raise this capital they will flounder because, according to the bill, they will be under supervision and growth restrictions. Will investors be interested in putting their money into an institution which is subject to close supervision and the risk of imminent closure by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation? I think not.

More to the point, however, is whether any future transactions involving failed or failing institutions will be possible after this bill sanctions a wholesale reneging of Federal agency agreements. With only uncertainty assured how costly will the enticements have to be for any new thrift investors?

I believed, last April, that the Senate bill went too far in its fervor to regulate the thrift industry from the legislative branch. But I thought this excess could be worked out in conference. We all know that this bill results in the abrogation of many agreements that the Federal Government made with healthy thrifts. Whether this approach is not only unfair but also unwise is a question which we will live with for the next few years. In my judgment, the Congress attempts to go too far in this conference report. It helps no one, it hurts many.

Unfortunately, the House version of this legislation compounds the mistake the Senate Banking Committee made. Still more unfortunately, the conference report adopts the errors of the House bill.

I fear that these misguided attempts at "restructuring" the thrift industry will result in the following egregious results: First, healthy institutions which are making money, providing home mortgages, and employing the citizens of my home State will find it impossible to stay in business because they will not be able to attract capital under the unrealistic rules in this bill; second, the FDIC will overreach its new authority and use healthy thrifts which do not meet the capital requirements for merely technical reasons as bait to accomplish a merger of a number of failed institutions with an acquiring bank; and third, the taxpayer will ultimately pay the price for the Congress' excess because healthy thrifts will be taken out of business.

A great deal of power is vested in regulatory agencies by this legislation. If wisdom could be legislated, I would be more optimistic about the future of the thrift industry in my State. I hope I will be pleasantly surprised by the performance of the FDIC and other agencies in implementing this legislation. But, for now, I think this legislation gives too much new authority to an agency that specializes in closing institutions. I fear it is ill-equipped to manage and restructure a major portion of an industry.

I am hopeful however, that at least not all of the healthy institutions will be ruined. I am pleased at least to see that the strict new capital rules will be applied to undercapitalized thrifts which are properly identified as separate from parent or subsidiary institutions. Therefore, a healthy institution would not be consolidated with an unhealthy one for supervisory purposes. This provision is good but it is unfortunately, like many other good provisions, locked into a fundamentally flawed conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield the remainder of his time?

Mr. RIEGLE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further debate on the conference report?

If not, the question is on agreeing to the conference report?

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. President, I ask that the vote be by division of the body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has asked for division. As many as are in favor of the conference report will rise and remain standing until they are counted.

(After a pause.)

Those opposed will rise and stand until counted.

On a division, the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. GARN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida may proceed when the Senate is in order. The Senate is not in order.

Without objection, the Senator from Florida may proceed.

POSITIONS ON VOTE

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be recorded "no" on the last vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will so reflect.

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, may I be recorded as "no" on the last vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will so reflect.

The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, may I be recorded as "no" on the last vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will so show.

The Chair in his capacity as a Senator from West Virginia will also be recorded as voting "no" on the last measure.

INCREASE IN STATUTORY LIMIT OF THE PUBLIC DEBT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senate will now proceed to the consideration of H.R. 3024, which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 3024) to increase the statutory limits on the public debt, and for other purposes.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, the House has sent the Senate a debt limit extension bill, H.R. 3024, with provisions substantially similar to an amendment approved last month by the Committee on Finance.

This is a short-term extension of the debt limit. I would have preferred to see the Senate pass a long-term extension. But, I understand that that is not realistic. We need to pass a debt limit increase and to pass it quickly.

Under the bill, the debt limit will be increased by $70 billion from the date of enactment through October 31. This will get us past the next 3 months so that we can concentrate on the other business of the Senate—completion of the budget and reconciliation process, action on appropriations bills, and the other legislative items on our agenda. But a part of that agenda will have to be the enactment of a long-term debt limit bill sometime before the end of October.

We need to pass the bill before us quickly. Treasury has reached the current debt limit. Within a few days and certainly by August 15, Treasury will have exhausted its cash. If that happens, the United States will, for the first time in its history, default on its obligations. That cannot and must not be allowed to happen. So we must act on this bill.

In addition to providing for a short-term increase in the debt limit, the bill includes a provision requested by the Treasury Department to change the treatment of certain securities which do not bear explicit interest but are sold at a discount. Under present law, such bonds are counted at their face value even though their actual value may be far lower. The amendment would instead count them at their actual accrued value. The result will be to provide consistent treatment under the debt limit for interest-bearing and non-interest-bearing securities.

As many of my colleagues are aware, I have been disappointed by the progress made this year in reducing our Nation's budget deficit and limiting the growth of our national debt. I share the frustration that has understandably grown inside and outside of this body about the failure to take more dramatic steps to put our fiscal house in order.

Many will suggest that the Federal budget process is to blame and should be changed yet again. In the past, extensions of the debt limit have served as a vehicle for a variety of budget process reforms. I do not disagree that the process may need to be changed. I am willing to look at proposals to change it, and it is very likely that I may find that I can support some such proposals with great enthusiasm. But we just do not have time between now and the default date to debate and enact budget reform proposals. We must allow this measure to pass without amendments so that unnecessary delays will not place the financial integrity of the U.S. Government at risk.

THE DEBT LIMIT

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. President, I rise before you today as I have done on many previous occasions to oppose the increase in the debt ceiling. It has become somewhat of a regular exercise for the Congress to raise the debt ceiling so that the Government can fulfill its financial obligations.

This new money for the national debt is not being borrowed to pay for debts already incurred, but to pay for what the Government thinks it wants to commit to spending over the next fiscal year. The new proposed debt limit is over $3 trillion, up from the current $2.8 trillion. Surely this continual upward trend deficit spending cannot go on if we are to achieve our goal of a balanced Federal budget.

I have said on previous occasions that debt is the driving force in our economy. This remains true today. This year, total public and private U.S. debt will stand at its highest level in history. The economic impact of that debt and the future debt obligations of this country will determine the future of our economic system.

In the United States, the sum of all debt held by the public and by Federal agencies is referred to as the gross Federal debt. Twelve years ago, such debt totaled $706.4 billion—today is is $2,868.8 billion.

The Depression and World War II saw the first big upsurge in the modern trend of deficit spending for its own sake. But under the Republican Congress in the late 1940's, and briefly under President Eisenhower in the 1950's, there was a repayment on the national debt. When public debt is repaid, there is a release of capital from a sterile use—the capitalization of future taxation—to a productive use, as bondholders can reinvest the proceeds of their Treasury security redemptions in private-sector bonds. The bonds issued by private companies go to finance productive capital formation, since those companies have to earn a real economic yield in order to issue bonds of investment grade.

In the 1960's, America's engagement in Vietnam caused a further surge in the debt spiral. By the mid-1970's, the national debt figure had reached the $500 billion mark. It took over 40 years to build up a debt of $500 billion, and less than 7 years to triple that figure.

The only solution to the ever-increasing debt spiral is to reduce current expenditures and the future debt obligations of this economy. The private sector has been in the process of reducing their demand for credit over the past several years. However, governments at every level have increased their demand for credit because they have failed in their responsibility to reduce their spending.

This process has had a deflationary impact on the economy, but that deflationary trend will be reversed if our capital markets become so short that the Government cannot use those markets to finance the periodic rollover of the debt. At that point our debt would have to be repaid by a direct inflation of our currency—just as the Federal Government did during the Civil War.

Long-term capital markets are the key to a sustained and robust economic system. Those markets can only be restored by a real and continued effort to pay off our debts and keep our currency sound. Without that commitment to a sound fiscal policy, we will simply condemn our children and their children to follow the example of every other nation throughout history by paying off our debts with a debased currency.

Mr. President, I can tell you from my experiences in meeting with the people in my State and around the country the American people wish we could go on a cash basis with Federal budget. I know there are sophisticated arguments that what we really need is a capital budget, so that these increases in the national debt could be classified as "investment financing"; and I know that the current crazy system of Federal Government accounting is some kind of compromise between that and pure cash accounting. But the reason why so many of my friends ask me to put the Federal Government on a cash basis is because that is the most strict form of accounting anyone can have.

This Government must learn to be prudent with our spending, live within our means and work out of what we have. I for one would be happy to see the President take command of the financial problems of this country and act as any chief executive officer would do to get his books in order. What is needed is to determine and establish priorities for the Federal Government and run this country on a cash basis.

Of course I believe it is Congress' prerogative to hold the power of the purse, under our Constitution; but I believe the "power of the purse" is a negative power—one that means the Congress should act to restrain taxes and to restrain spending by an Executive that might try to be too aggressive. That is the original sense of the concept in Magna Carta and in the English Parliament. Unfortunately, today, my colleagues use the concept of "the power of the purse" affirmatively, to compel excessive spending the executive branch would actually like to curtail.

I believe it is time for us to make a commitment to reducing the debt that we have been building up in this country. We need the balanced budget constitutional amendment; we need the enhanced recission authority that Vice President DAN QUAYLE championed when he was a Member of the Senate; and we need, most of all, to come to our senses in Congress and carry out the will of the people to eliminate the deficit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

The Republican leader is recognized.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have been designated by Senator PACKWOOD to handle the bill on this side.

So I yield back his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Is all time yielded back?

Mr. BENSTEN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of the time on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on the third reading and passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

So the bill (H.R. 3024) was passed.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. DOLE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

POSITION ON VOTE

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, in an effort to accommodate the business of the Senate, I did not object to the unanimous consent of the majority leader providing for passage of H.R. 3024, legislation providing for a temporary increase in the debt ceiling without a record vote. However, I wish the RECORD to reflect that had I voted, I would have voted "no".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will so reflect.

The Senator from North Carolina.

DEFICITS NOT BEING REDUCED

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. President, if Gramm-Rudman is working, is actually reducing our deficits, why then are we increasing the debt limit?

It is with complete reluctance that I have agreed that the debt ceiling resolution might be considered without amendments. I also have agreed not to object to a voice vote here in the waning hours before recess.

The debt that has been allowed to accumulate in the last 8 years is an outrageous example of fiscal irresponsibility. While President Reagan, and now President Bush, were representing to the public that the deficits were being reduced, the opposite was the truth.

There has not been a penny in reduction. There have been constantly climbing deficits, each in the neighborhood of a quarter of a trillion dollars. That is why we must today increase the debt ceiling to more than $3 trillion.

Had it not been for the desire of the leadership to move this legislation without dissent, I would have introduced and worked for the passage of the following joint resolution:

At the appropriate place, insert the following:

SEC. . ACHIEVEMENT OF AN HONEST BUDGET.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the Congress and the President have attempted over the course of the last several years to meet the deficit reduction targets established under Gramm-Rudman-Hollings, which has not lowered the annual increases in the national debt;

(2) despite these efforts, the increase in the national debt, which is the real accounting deficit, has grown each year and is projected to be in this and subsequent years more than a quarter of a trillion dollars each year;

(3) the longer we delay real reduction and continue using Social Security and other program reserves as accounting devices to conceal the true size of our annual deficits, the more impossible this task of debt reduction will become; and

(4) controlling the continual increase in the national debt cannot be satisfactorily accomplished without the leadership and support of the President.

(b) SENSE OF THE SENATE.—It is the sense of the Senate that before any future increases of debt ceiling will be approved by the Senate—

(1) the President shall present to the Congress a new schedule of deficit reduction targets based on the actual deficits, the annual increases in the national debt; and

(2) the President also shall present to Congress a comprehensive multiyear proposal to reduce the Federal debt to a more acceptable percentage of the Gross National Product.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska is recognized.

POSITIONS ON VOTE

Mr. EXON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I also be allowed to list my name in opposition to the last vote, as I did on the previous one.

I voted "nay" in both cases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be the order.

The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I similarly ask unanimous consent to be recorded as having voted "no" had there been a recorded vote on the last vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator will be so recorded.

Mr. CONRAD. Mr. President, I would also like the RECORD to reflect that I associate myself with the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SANFORD].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The RECORD will so reflect.

The Senator from Kentucky is recognized.

STATE AUTHORITY TO REGULATE ACQUISITION OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I rise to engage in a colloquy with the distinguished chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Judiciary Committee. As the distinguished chairman is aware, Hoylake Investments, Ltd., has filed a lawsuit in each of the nine States that have jurisdiction to review the proposed aquisition of BAT Industries by Hoylake. In each of these cases, Hoylake has asserted that the relevant State statute is an unconstitutional burden on foreign commerce.

Is it the chairman's understanding that Congress has the power to delegate to the States its authority to regulate insurance as a form of commerce?

Mr. SIMON. The Senator correctly states the constitutional principle.

Mr. FORD. Am I also correct that Congress has so exercised such power to delegate to the States the authority to regulate the acquisition of control of insurance companies by domestic or foreign persons?

Mr. SIMON. Once again, the Senator correctly states the law. State insurance commissioners have the authority to review the Hoylake bid for BAT Industries, when it would result in a change of control of insurance companies in their States.

Mr. FORD. I thank the distinguished chairman for this clarification.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, pursuant to 22 U.S.C. 276, as amended, appoints the following Senators as members of the Senate delegation to the Fall Interparliamentary Union Meeting during the 1st session of the 101st Congress, to be held in London, England, September 4-9, 1989: the Senator from Washington [Mr. ADAMS] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. FOWLER].

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be a period for morning business with Senators permitted to speak therein.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROBERT C. BYRD'S GENEALOGY

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, several years ago, considerable effort was made to trace my ancestral roots. The work was, by no means, complete, as of course, it could never be.

I ask unanimous consent that the results of that effort be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the genealogy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROBERT C. BYRD'S GENEALOGY

The origin of the name Sale derives from the name de la Salle, French, from the time of the Norman conquest. The English meaning of the word salle is "room" or "hall".

The first appearance of the name Sale in England seems to be that of Robert de la Sale, in 1273. Sale also appears as Salle, Sales, Sayle.

William Sale, born in 1638, was brought by one John Stevens in 1657, from England. Sale worked as a planter for seven years, after which he was granted 130 acres of land. Seven years was a common indenture which he probably served in exchange for passage from England. The land lay "on the East side" of the Chickahominy River. In 1679, William Sale bought 400 acres in old Rappahannock County, later a part of Essex County. He died "before 1704" in Essex County. His wife's name is unknown, but she died "after 1704" in Essex County.

William Sale had a son, Cornelius, who died in 1746. Cornelius married Hanna (last name unknown). William also had a son, Anthony, and a daughter, Elizabeth.

Cornelius named six sons in his will, which was made on April 3, 1745, and probated on March 17, 1746. The sons named in the will are William, Anthony, John, Thomas, James, and Cornelius.

One of these six sons was the father of William Sale, Sr., born about 1725, probably in Essex County. He died in 1788 in Wilkes County. He married Ann (last name unknown). They had thirteen children including, Robert, Sr., Leonard, Cornelius, James, William, Jr., John, and Thomas.

Robert Sale, Sr., was born in Halifax County, North Carolina in 1772. He died in 1866. He had ten children including sons, Robert Sale, Jr., and William. (Robert Sale, Sr.'s, wife is unknown.)

William Sale was born in 1815 in Wilkes County, North Carolina. He died in May of 1889. He married Caroline Dickerson on April 23, 1844. Caroline was born in 1823 or 1824 in Surry County, North Carolina. Caroline's father and mother were probably Wiley and Nancy (Cole) Dickerson. Wiley's grandfather was probably Griffith Dickerson of Bute County, North Carolina. William Sale and Caroline were the parents of James Sale.

James Sale was born in May of 1844 or 1846 (?) in Wilkes County, North Carolina. James married Martha Elizabeth Henderson on January 14, 1867. Martha Elizabeth Henderson's parents were Eli Henderson and Caroline Somers (or Summers or Sommers). (Caroline's parents were John and Frances Somers—or Summers or Sommers); Eli's father and mother may have been William and Judith Henderson; the names Henderson and Somers (or Summers or Sommers) are prominent in Caswell County.) Martha Elizabeth Henderson was born on May 2, 1848, in Iredell County, North Carolina. She died on June 10, 1928, in Wilkes County, North Carolina. James and Martha Elizabeth Sale had twelve children, ten of whom were alive in 1900 (census). One of James and Martha Elizabeth's children was Cornelius Calvin Sale.

Cornelius Calvin Sale was born on May 1, 1875, in North Wilkesboro, North Carolina. At the age of twenty eight, he married Ada Kirby, who was nineteen years old at the time, on April 28, 1906. Ada Kirby was born in March of 1888 in Lenoir, Caldwell County, North Carolina. Ada Kirby's father was James Kirby, and her mother's name was Ella Rebecca Lawrence, whose father was Leander M. Lawrence and mother was Clementine Murchison. Leander Lawrence's parents were Alexander E. Lawrence and Ruea. Alexander's parents were Barnabus and Eleanor Lawrence. Ada Kirby's father, James, was born in April of 1864. He and his family were in Kings Creek Township, Caldwell County, North Carolina, in 1900. James Kirby had brothers Thomas and Franklin. Their mother was Margaret Tilley Kirby, whose husband was Avery Kirby. Avery Kirby's parents were Riley (or Rilie) Kirby and Mary. Margaret Tilley's parents were Hosea Tilley, born in 1822, and Nancy, born in 1820. Hosea Tilley's parents were Lewis, born in 1780, and Mary Tilley, born in 1783. Lewis Tilley's parents were Edmond (or Edmund) Sr., and Sarah (Margaret?) Tilley. Edmond (or Edmund), Sr.'s last will and testament was made on December 19, 1793, and probated in May of 1800. Edmond (or Edmund) was a Revolutionary War soldier.

Cornelius Calvin Sale and his wife, Ada Kirby, had five children—Clyde, born in 1907, William, Reuben, Jettie, and Cornelius Calvin Sale, Jr., (Robert Carlyle Byrd), who was born on November 20, 1917.

S. 686, AS PASSED BY THE SENATE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, today the Senate voted to enact comprehensive oilspill liability and oilspill response legislation. I voted for the bill. The distinguished Senate majority leader, Senator GEORGE MITCHELL, has committed a great deal of his Senate career to enacting comprehensive liability legislation. His expertise and appreciation of the complexities of the issues associated with oilspill liability legislation led to the passage of text similar to that of S. 686 in the 99th Congress and once again today.

I have worked for over 10 years to enact comprehensive oilspill legislation and fully appreciate the work it takes to strike the balance needed for responsible liability and compensation legislation. Enactment of such legislation is sound Federal policy. However, I am sorry that it took a crisis to enact this bill. The result of legislating in crisis mode may severely jeopardize final enactment of this bill.

S. 686, as introduced by the Senate majority leader, was a thoughtful approach to oilspill liability. The bill was strengthened, through his leadership, in the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee. The bill as reported from the committee was a strong bill with a carefully crafted balance of prevention, response, and compensation.

As long as we are a nation dependent on oil, we will be subject to threats from oilspills, particularly from tankers. This bill was designed to strengthen safety and prevention requirements in order to minimize future spills. If for some reason, despite those requirements, spills do occur, the President is put in charge of removing or arranging for removal of the spill. This unambiguous authority will ensure that prompt action will be taken to contain the spill. Owners and operators of vessels and facilities will be required to have response capability. Regional response teams will be established to ensure prompt response to a spill using on-site, state-of-the-art technology. This prompt action should minimize the likelihood of a catastrophic spill. Whatever damages and removal costs are incurred during cleanup will be compensated by the spiller up to a reasonable liability limit. The establishment of limits and the requirement that those subject to the limits have adequate financial responsibility will ensure fast and certain compensation for claimants. In the event that the removal costs and damages exceed the liability limits, a $1 billion fund, financed by industry will be available to assure cleanup of the spill.

The Senate Commerce Committee under the leadership of its distinguished chairman, FRITZ HOLLINGS, amended S. 686 to strengthen vessel safety requirements, navigation procedures, and vessel pilot licensing procedures. This provision authored by the Commerce Committee will go a long way toward preventing future accidents such as the Exxon Valdez spill.

However, two ill-conceived amendments adopted today threaten ultimate enactment of this legislation. These amendments are clearly the result of legislating in the wake of a crisis. One amendment has the effect of singling out OCS facilities for different treatment with respect to liability limits. These facilities are responsible for only 2 percent of the world's total oilspills. No major spill has occurred since 1969 because of prevention. This amendment penalizes those facilities for being good operators. It does nothing to protect the environment.

Second, an amendment was adopted to significantly increase the liability limits the Senate Environment Committee adopted. The increases were arbitrary. They were not thoughtfully chosen or debated. This amendment was directed at a perceived need to appear tough on oilspills when in fact the amendment will be tough on the consumer.

Both of these amendments severely and needlessly jeopardize the bill. They jeopardize the reasoned and thoughtful approach first introduced to this body by the distinguished majority leader. I look forward to working with my colleagues in the Senate and former colleagues in the House to restore that balance.

NEW FEDERAL RAILROAD ADMINISTRATOR

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I am pleased with the Senate's recent confirmation of Gilbert Carmichael to be the new Administrator of the Federal Railroad Administration [FRA]. Mr. Carmichael's background in the railroad business and his desire to maintain our Nation's railroads as a viable transportation alternative convinces me he will be an able Administrator.

Mr. Carmichael has big shoes to fill. His predecessor, John Riley, is a good friend. I thoroughly enjoyed working with John on a number of projects of importance to South Dakota and appreciate his openness and accessibility.

Mr. Carmichael, as the new Administrator, inherits a solid team of highly professional men and women, like Executive Director Bill Loftus, who are dedicated to the task of overseeing rail safety programs and administering railroad financial assistance programs. The FRA staff are some of the most professional and competent people I have ever met in public service.

Many important issues face the railroad industry. In rural areas like South Dakota, the most important issue is the very preservation of railroad service. Short-line and regional railroads have sprung up to carry much of the load. However, these operations are often financially vulnerable and need the help of Federal programs like Local Rail Service Assistance [LRSA], section 505 loans and section 511 loan guarantees to stay alive.

Again, I welcome Gilbert Carmichael as the new head of the Federal Railroad Administration. I look forward to working together with him and the very competent FRA staff in maintaining and improving our Nation's rail system.

MEDICAL FREE ELECTRON LASER PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, some times big programs have small spinoffs which yield big results. One such program is the Medical Free Electron Laser Program which we reauthorized Tuesday on the Defense bill.

The MFEL Program is a tiny portion of the SDI budget—$20 million. But it has the potential to revolutionize health care for the next generation of Americans.

Just a few weeks ago, I had the opportunity to visit the Wellman Laboratories of Photomedicine which are based with Harvard Medical School and Massachusetts General Hospital. I was simply astonished at the work they are doing on cancer, eye disease, burn therapy, heart disease, kidney stones and skin disease.

Using lasers and light-sensitive dyes they can break up blood clots to prevent heart disease—without any surgery or damage to tissue.

Glaucoma patients will benefit from similar techniques which pin-point the precise area of the eye affected, and treat it without a single cut on the eye itself.

Anybody who suffers from kidney stones understands what it would mean to be able simply to dissolve them. They have developed just such a process at Wellman, In fact, I held a laser in my hand and dissolved a kidney stone—it works.

These are just some of the things they are doing. And Wellman is just one of the centers working on the Medical Free Electron Program. Researchers at Baylor, Duke, Northwestern, USC, University of Utah, and Vanderbilt are all doing superb related work.

I think it is plain that every man, woman, and child has an interest in seeing this research pursued, and I think it is well worth $20 million. But I would also like to make to other points about cost.

First, because MFEL is an applications program, the centers we fund today are developing medical applications which will soon win FDA-approval. This will bring in non-Government money, so in just a few years, we can expect the MFEL centers to be self-supporting.

A second point to keep in mind is that this country spends billions of public and private money on health care each year. Laser medicine not only promises hope where there was none, it also simplifies surgery and reduces once complex treatments to outpatient cases. Imagine the billions of dollars, over the long-run, that such breakthroughs will mean.

For all these reasons the MFEL Program has had the enthusiastic support of Senators on both sides of the aisle. We have worked many months with SDIO Director, General Monahan, to craft a program with just the right balance of medical applications and other scientific research.

I think we now have a perfect set of guidelines which General Monahan has set forth in identical letters to the majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, the chairperson and ranking member of the Armed Services Committee, Senators NUNN and WARNER, and to me. I ask unanimous consent that the general's letter to me be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE, STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE ORGANIZATION,

Washington, DC, August 2, 1989.

Hon. ROBERT DOLE,
Minority Leader, U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR DOLE: I appreciate the interest which a number of Senators have shown in the Medical Free Electron Laser (MFEL) program. This program is one of the most promising SDI spin-offs which may well revolutionize health care for the next generation of Americans. The best way to achieve this is to focus the MFEL program on medical applications while preserving some flexibility to balance it with more general scientific efforts which have medical, as well as other, potential. I am writing to you to set forth how SDIO plans to manage the MFEL program during fiscal years 1990 and 1991.

No less than four-fifths of the funds authorized for FY 90 and FY 91 ($16 million of $20 million each year) will be applied to adapting existing free electron laser technology applications in medicine, photobiology, surgery and associated materials science. This portion of the program will be carried out at not less than seven nor more than ten geographically distributed regional, university-based, multi-disciplinary medical research centers. These centers will be chosen by a peer review process which meets standards generally accepted in the medical and scientific research communities.

No more than one-fifth of the funds authorized for FY 90 and FY 91 ($4 million of $20 million each year) may be applied to FEL efforts at other scientific research facilities. Although work undertaken under this portion of the program may offer potential applications in many fields, one criterion for center selection will be potential medical application. Selection will be by a peer review process which meets standards generally accepted in the medical and scientific research communities.

The peer review process will be established as quickly as possible during FY 90. However, recognizing that this process may continue to late FY 90, SDIO plans to extend research efforts, as needed to avoid terminating ongoing efforts prior to completion of the peer review process. This will be accomplished within the $20,000,000 authorized for FY 90 in the FY 90/91 Defense Authorization Act.

The peer review group will be instructed to insure that each center chosen for the medical applications portion of the MFEL program has reasonable plans to develop medical applications of free electron laser technology by the end of fiscal year 1993. Beginning in fiscal year 1994, SDIO expects the MFEL program to be handed off to an appropriate agency outside the Department of Defense. Furthermore, because this program is for applications development, by fiscal year 1994 the centers should have begun increasingly to rely upon non-government sources for their continuing work.

Another criterion upon which the peer review will be instructed to insist is that all centers be able and willing to provide user facilities for research groups outside the center which are studying the applications of this technology. Indeed, the purpose of establishing regional centers is to maximize the participation of qualified institutions and individuals at institutions which have a sufficiently broad multi-disciplinary based to achieve the program's objectives. Many who are currently engaged in MFEL program work will continue their work through center-peer review projects, thus maximizing the potential result of their work.

I believe that this outlines the MFEL program which we have worked upon together. Again, I thank you for your interest and hard work in the MFEL program.

Sincerely,

GEORGE L. MONAHAN, JR.,
Lieutenant General, USAF, Director.

Mr. DOLE. General Monahan, Col. Dan Heitz and Mr. Nick Montanarelli have worked very hard with us, and I thank them.

I would also like to thank my colleagues, Senators DIXON, GARN, GRAHAM, KENNEDY, MACK, RUDMAN, and WILSON who have worked so hard to set this program in the right direction.

Finally, I would like to recognize the efforts of Laura Abplanalp, Jay Behuncik, Jackie Clegg and Pat McCartan, the Senate staffers who were crucial to a good outcome for the MFEL Program.

We will all be grateful to these Senators, staffers and DOD professionals for years to come.

THE AMERICANS WITH DISABILITIES ACT

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, last month, we celebrated the 25th anniversary of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The passage of the Civil Rights Act was one of Congress'—and America's—shining moments. And it was one of the great milestones in America's long journey toward civil rights justice. So I am pleased today to join with President Bush in endorsing the Americans With Disabilities Act—the next major step in the civil rights struggle—and a bill that will finally expand civil rights protections for people with disabilities.

Two days ago, President Bush announced his endorsement of the ADA. I commend the President for his genuine commitment and leadership on this landmark civil rights legislation. His commitment and leadership will help to create a more inclusive America, an America that is more fully integrated, an America that does not place needless and harmful barriers in the way of her citizens with disabilities.

The substitute bill passed by the Labor Committee reflects the broad bipartisan support for the ADA. This support was gained after a long series of negotiations among the administration, members of the Labor Committee, and other interested Senators. I know that the White House and Senate staffs have spent many, many hours together. And I commend both staffs for their hard work, their perseverance, and their willingness to sit down and hammer out a compromise package.

This bipartisan substitute bill addresses many of my previous concerns—concerns that I raised during my testimony before the Labor Committee last May. The compromise reached in the substitute bill goes far to strike a fair balance—a balance that fully embraces the vision of a barrier-free society for all Americans, but one that also recognizes that this vision will have some costs.

I am particularly pleased with the substitute bill's tough—but fair—remedies provisions and the phase-in period for small businesses. I am also pleased that a technical assistance amendment was adopted in the committee markup. I intend to work with other Senators and other interested parties to strengthen this amendment as the legislative process unfolds.

But a few outstanding issues still need some further clarification. I am concerned—for example—about the impact of the ADA's private transportation provisions on bus service in our rural communities. I want to ensure that rural bus service will not—in any way—be diminished by the requirements imposed by these provisions.

I am also concerned about the need to educate the private sector about the ADA generally. For the ADA is sweeping legislation—legislation that will affect not just the Fortune 500, not just our large cities, but just about every private business, every State and local government, and every community in America. Let there be no doubt about that.

So I look forward to addressing these—and other—issues when the ADA reaches the Senate floor. And I am pleased to stand here today to formally endorse this important piece of legislation.

LEGISLATIVE LINE-ITEM VETO RESCISSION

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, later on today the Senate will vote to raise the Federal debt limit by $70 billion for a new debt limit total of $2.87 trillion. Now, that may sound like a lot of money to most people, but in Congress it is only enough spending change to last 3 months.

Mr. President, it took our country 213 years to borrow our first trillion, but it has taken our country only 4 years to borrow our third. Some in Congress say the solution is to raise taxes, but the American people know better: we must stop our reckless spending, and we must stop it now.

Senator COATS, Senator MCCAIN, Senator ARMSTRONG, and Senator HUMPHREY have worked for many months to come up with a way of slowing the growth of Government spending. Their solution is to give the President legislative line-item veto rescission authority.

Legislative line-item veto rescission is certainly a mouthful, but in short, it means Congress would no longer have close to limitless power to set aside Federal tax money for special projects in their home districts. With a legislative line-item veto, the President would be able to slice out wasteful spending projects, bundle them up into a new bill, and send that bill back to Congress for a second look.

Forcing Congress to confront its wasteful spending choices a second time may sound like a simple reform, but believe me, it is one that will have very far-reaching effects. Instead of being able to hide special projects in spending bills the size of telephone books, Members will be forced to vote "yes" or "no" on a pork-only spending bill. Who is going to want a vote like that on their record.

The end result is going to be that Congress and the President will be able to move more quickly to meet the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings targets without phony gimmicks, or worse, new taxes.

I want to praise Senator COATS, our newest Senator, for his leadership on this effort. Although Senator MCCAIN, Senator HUMPHREY, and Senator ARMSTRONG have been pushing their own excellent variations of this bill for many years, it took the hard work of Senator COATS to bring everyone together on this compromise. I have been told they have at least 32 cosponsors for this bill, as well as the strong support of the President of the United States.

I urge Members to look closely at this bill, the Legislative Line-Item-Veto Act, and join us in our effort to bring accountability and responsibility back to the congressional budget process.

ROMAN HRUSKA, 85 THIS MONTH

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, my friend and our former colleague, Roman Hruska, is celebrating his 85th birthday this month. As many Members remember, Roman Hruska was a Senator of the highest caliber and principles who worked diligently for the people of his great State of Nebraska, his region, and for the welfare of the entire Nation. His retirement at the end of the 94th Congress left a great void in this body.

As the long time ranking member of the Judiciary Committee, Roman Hruska was a tireless worker to balance the interest of law enforcement and fairness for the accused. He authored many bills which are on the statute books today in the area of criminal justice. At the time of his retirement in 1976, Roman Hruska had also played a major role in the confirmation of every then sitting Supreme Court Justice and for a majority of those sitting on the lower Federal courts. His mark is still evident today and frequent reference is made to his contributions to judiciary reports.

Unlike many, Roman Hruska did not really retire when he left the Senate, but rather returned to his beloved Omaha and again took up the practice of law which he had pursued for some 25 years before entering the Senate. His wonderful wife Vicki says that Roman's idea of retirement in his 85th year is to "sometimes go to the office late on Monday morning at 10 a.m. and to occasionally take off early on Friday afternoons."

We all envy Roman for his vigor and for his extraordinary wife and family. He is indeed a role model for us all that there is a full and active life after Senate service.

Mr. President, I know all my colleagues join with me in wishing Roman a happy birthday.

WILLIAM LUCAS AND RECENT SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in recent days we have heard strident and unfounded attacks on the Supreme Court. These attacks have been generated as a result of several sound, reasonable, and genuinely moderate civil rights decisions handed down this term. A myth is already beginning to develop that these are radical decisions or that the Court is turning back the clock. Simply stated, this is untrue. This myth is being fostered by those who believe in equality of result rather than equality of opportunity; who believe that jobs and opportunities in our society should be handed out according to a group's proportion in society; who believe in group rights rather than individual rights; and who either blink at reverse discrimination or who forthrightly endorse it as a means of curing discrimination. What these decisions have actually done is promote balance and common sense in the interpretation of our civil rights laws.

And now, with an irony that apparently escapes the news media, those who once claimed that the Reagan administration imposed a litmus test on its judicial nominees are now seeking to impose a litmus test on President Bush's appointments in the area of civil rights.

The litmus test, ostensibly, is opposition to these Supreme Court decisions which allegedly have curtailed civil rights in the United States. In fact, once the cases are read and understood, it is clear that the litmus test is about adherence to the doctrine of equality of results and reverse discrimination, instead of equality of opportunity and color blindness.

William Lucas, the President's excellent choice for Assistant Attorney General for Civil Rights, has been subjected to this litmus test.

Black Americans who depart from the orthodoxy of proportional representation and racial preference are being told that their names will be dragged through the mud. They are being told that they can't pass muster before the guardians of liberal orthodoxy. The Senate shouldn't stand for this insidious new form of prejudice.

The irony is especially striking, because as I mentioned earlier, these decisions signal a return to common sense, rather than a return to an era where civil rights were not protected for all Americans.

Given the rhetoric of alarm that has dominated the debate to date, it might be more helpful to review the actual language of the Court's decisions. In Wards Cove Packing Co. versus Atonio, the Supreme Court construed the application of the disparate impact standard, also known as the discriminatory effect standard, under title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act. Title VII bans employment discrimination.

Under the 1971 Griggs v. Duke Power Co. decision (401 U.S. 424), even though an employer has not intentionally discriminated against someone on account of race, the employer can still be liable under title VII under a disparate impact theory. That is, even if an employer uses neutral employment standards and neutrally applies them, the employer can still be penalized if a Federal agency or court decides that those neutral standards have a statistically greater negative impact on a particular racial, ethnic, or gender group.

The Atonio case involved two cannery companies. Unskilled cannery jobs—that is, the jobs on the cannery line itself—were filled predominantly by nonwhites. The skilled noncannery jobs, including jobs such as machinists, engineers, quality-control inspectors, and boat operators were filled predominantly by white workers.

The plaintiffs claimed the employers discriminated against them in the skilled job categories.

The Supreme Court said that though statistical proof can alone make out a prima facie case, the lower courts misused the statistics in this particular case. Thus, the Court clearly did not rule out the proper use of statistical evidence in an employment discrimination case. But the Court made clear that to compare the percentage of minorities in unskilled jobs to the percentage in much different, skilled jobs is an obvious abuse of the disparate impact theory. The Court quoted a 12-year-old decision, Hazelwood School District v. United States, 433 U.S. 299 (1977), to make this very noncontroversial point. "The 'proper comparison [is] between the racial composition of [the at-issue jobs] and the racial composition of the qualified * * * population in the relevant labor market.'" Slip opinion at 6, 7, quoting Hazelwood, 433 U.S. at 308.

In other words, in order to proceed beyond their initial showing, plaintiffs must make out a prima facie case by comparing the percentage of minorities in the skilled jobs against the percentage of qualified minorities in the labor pool for those jobs. As Justice White said, speaking for the Court, "Measuring alleged discrimination in the selection of accountants, managers, boat captains, electricians, doctors, and engineers * * * by comparing the number of nonwhites occupying these jobs to the number of nonwhites filling [unskilled] cannery worker positions is nonsensical." Slip opinion at 7. As he correctly noted, such a "nonsensical" comparison could lead to a finding of employer liability: "[t]he only practicable option for many employers will be to adopt racial quotas, insuring that no portion of his work force deviates in racial composition from the other portions thereof; this is a result that Congress expressly rejected in drafting Title VII." Slip opinion at page 8.

Next, the Court said that once plaintiffs make the proper statistical showing, they must "demonstrate that the disparity they complain of is the result of one or more of the employment practices that they are attacking here, specifically showing that each challenged practice has a significant disparate impact on employment opportunities for whites and nonwhites." Slip opinion at 13. That seems to be an obvious requirement for a plaintiff—you can't just show a statistical disparity without attributing it to a specific employer practice. As Justice White said, "To hold otherwise would result in employers being potentially liable for 'the myriad of innocent causes that may lead to statistical imbalances in the composition of their work forces'," quoting an earlier decision. Slip opinion at 13.

This is not a heavy burden, because again in Justice White's words, "liberal civil discovery rules give plaintiffs broad access to employers' records in an effort to document their claims." Slip opinion at 13. Moreover, Federal regulations require employers to keep extensive information about their employment practices, all of which is discoverable.

Finally, the Court ruled that once a prima facie case has been made, "the dispositive issue is whether the challenged practice serves, in a significant way, the legitimate goals of the employer." Slip opinion at 15, citing several earlier cases.

"In this phase," wrote Justice White, "the employer carries the burden of producing evidence of a business justification for his employment practice. The burden of persuasion, however, remains with the disparate-impact plaintiff." Slip opinion at 15.

This is, the ultimate burden of proving illegal discrimination remains with the plaintiff. And what is so radical about the elementary point that plaintiffs have the burden of proving their cases? As Justice White said, citing Federal Rule of Evidence 301, "This rule conforms with the usual method for allocating persuasion and production burdens in the federal courts * * * and more specifically, it conforms to the rule in disparate-treatment cases that the plaintiff bears the burden of disproving an employer's assertion that the adverse employment action or practice was based solely on a legitimate neutral consideration," again citing earlier cases. Slip opinion at 16. In other words, all the Court did in Atonio was make clear that the same burdens of production and persuasion that pertain to other civil cases and to discriminatory intent cases apply to discriminatory effect cases.

Even if the plaintiffs cannot persuade the court that the employer's justification for the standard of criteria in question is not valid, the plaintiffs still have a chance to prevail. They can persuade the factfinder that there are other tests or selection criteria without a similar racial effect which would also serve the employer's legitimate interests.

In short, this case retains the controversial disparate impact theory, but makes some effort to ensure that it is as reasonably applied as possible. It also attempts to avoid imposing racial or gender proportionality on American employers through the misuse of statistics and the misallocation of the burden of proof.

And, it reiterates a 12-year-old decision that when one is using statistics to allege discrimination, the numerical comparison must be between persons in the job in question and the qualified population in the relevant labor market for that job.

Let me turn to Martin versus Wilks. In 1974, black plaintiffs and the NAACP filed a title VII suit against the city of Birmingham and the Jefferson County Personnel Board. Two consent decrees resulted—one between plaintiffs and the city and another between plaintiffs and the board. These consent decrees set out long-term and interim goals for hiring and promoting black firefighters. Justice Marshall, in his dissent, candidly called them "goals and quotas." Slip opinion, dissenting opinion (J. Marshall) at 7.

The district court ruled that white firefighters were precluded from challenging employment decisions taken by the city and board pursuant to the two consent decrees. These firefighters alleged that they were being denied promotions because of their race in favor of less qualified blacks. The Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit reversed and said that the white firefighters were entitled to their day in court in order to be fully heard on the merits, if any, of their claims. The Supreme Court agreed.

Thus, this case is simply about the right of persons to be heard on the merits when they believe they are harmed by a consent decree in a case to which they had not been a party. This case is not about the merits of affirmative action, reverse discrimination, and so forth. It is about procedural fairness.

As Chief Justice Rehnquist stated, a holding which precludes these plaintiffs from challenging employment decisions based on consent decrees agreed to in a case to which they had not been parties "contravenes the general rule that a person cannot be deprived of his legal rights in a proceeding to which he is not a party." Slip opinion at 1, 2.

What is so radical about that?

The Chief Justice went on to note, "All agree that '[i]t is a principle of general application in anglo-American jurisprudence that one is not bound by a judgment in personam in a litigation in which he is not designated as a party or to which he has not been made a party by service of process,'" citing a 1940 case, and others. Slip opinion at 4, 5. He noted that, "This rule is part of our 'deep-rooted historic tradition that everyone should have his own day in court.'" Slip opinion at 5. That is a very strong affirmation of elementary civil rights.

Now, some may claim that since these white firefighters were aware of the underlying lawsuit and failed to intervene, they should be precluded from initiating their own lawsuit to have their claims heard. But as Justice Brandeis said in Chase National Bank v. Norwalk, 29 U.S. 431, 441 (1934): "The law does not impose upon any person absolutely entitled to a hearing the burden of voluntary intervention in a suit to which he is a stranger. * * * Unless duly summoned to appear in a legal proceeding, a person not a privy may rest assured that a judgment recovered therein will not affect his legal rights."

Chief Justice Rehnquist noted that the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure reflect this elementary principle. Slip opinion at page 6.

If a party wants to bind others who are affected by the consent decree in a case, then that party must seek to join in the lawsuit those others whose rights are at stake. Otherwise, persons not a party to a case are entitled to their day in court.

I wish to note, Mr. President, that this decision protects all persons adversely affected by decrees in cases to which they are not parties. Even in the context of civil rights cases, in our increasingly multicultural country, it is important to understand this is not a black-white issue. If consent decrees provide for quota-type hiring or promotion in favor of, say, blacks, then Hispanics, Asians, or women who feel adversely affected might well wish to assert their claims in a lawsuit.

Indeed, several years ago, the New Orleans Police Department entered into a consent decree providing for quota hiring and promotions until all ranks of the police department were 50/50 black-white. Separate groups of Hispanic and women officers intervened to oppose the consent decree. A group of white officers also intervened to object to the consent decree. What the Wilks decision does is to preserve one's right to initiate one's own lawsuit, in the event an individual, or others claiming injury from the consent decree, chooses not to seek intervention in the existing case. I assume that no one would want to deny a person who applies for a job after the entry of such a consent decree, and who had no notice of the consent decree, the right to bring such a lawsuit.

Keep in mind that plaintiffs in a later lawsuit who sue over these consent decrees will have to make their case under current law and precedent. If the consent decrees are legally sound, they will withstand the challenge. If they are legally infirm, and infringe upon the rights of innocent third persons who were not parties to the lawsuit, then it is obviously important to allow challenges to them. Indeed, the potential for such a lawsuit serves as another check on the parties to litigation to be sure that the rights of those who are not present in the courtroom are preserved.

In short, the Wilks decision does not change substantive law. It is about procedural fairness.

Another case, Lorance versus AT&T Technologies, involved a claim that an employer's seniority system was intentionally discriminatory against women. Under title VII, seniority systems are given special protection. Only claims of intentional discrimination are cognizable against seniority systems.

In Lorance, the plaintiffs did not claim "that the seniority system treats similarly situated employees differently or that it has been operated in an intentionally discriminatory manner."

Slip opinion at 5. They claimed that the system was adopted to protect certain male employees. Three years after its adoption, the plaintiffs were demoted under this gender neutral seniority system. The Court ruled that the period of limitation within which a claim must be filed alleging such discrimination in the adoption of a seniority system, which is neutral in form and application, begins to run at the time of the adoption of the seniority system.

This is a reasonable decision. As Justice Scalia wrote for the 5-3 majority, "In holding that, when a seniority system is nondiscriminatory in form and application, it is the allegedly discriminatory adoption which triggers the limitations period, we respect not only [Title VII's] general value judgment concerning the point at which the interests in favor of protecting valid claims are outweighed by the interests in prohibiting the prosecution of stale [claims], but also the considerations underlying the special treatment accorded to seniority systems under [Title VII]. This 'special treatment' strikes a balance between the interests of those protected against discrimination by title VII and those who work—perhaps for many years—in reliance upon the validity of a facially lawful seniority system." Slip opinion at page 11 [citation omitted; emphasis in original].

My colleagues should note that this decision pertains to the time limitation on bringing a claim against a facially neutral seniority system where plaintiffs charge that the system was illegally adopted. The Court also made clear that a facially discriminatory seniority system can be challenged every time it is applied. Slip opinion at 11, and n. 5.

In Patterson versus McLean Credit Union, the Court construed title 42, United States Code, section 1981. This 1870 statute states, in relevant part: "All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right * * * to make and enforce contracts * * * as is enjoyed by white citizens * * *"

For about 100 years, section 1981 was not applied to private conduct. Mr. Justice White's scholarly dissent in Runyon v. McCrary, 427 U.S. 160, 192 (1976), makes a strong case against section 1981 does reach private conduct. The Runyon decision itself has been the focal point of legitimate criticism.

In Patterson, the plaintiff, a black woman, alleged that she had been racially harassed on the job. The Court considered overturning Runyon altogether. Instead, by a 9 to 0 vote, the Court upheld section 1981's controversial applicability to private conduct and expressly declined to overrule Runyon.

The Court also ruled, in construing the plain language of section 1981, that "racial harassment relating to the conditions of employment is not actionable under section 1981 because that provision does not apply to conduct which occurs after the formation of a contract and which does not interfere with the right to enforce established contract obligations." Slip opinion at 3.

As Justice Kennedy noted, the "most obvious feature" of the plain language of section 1981 "is the restriction of its scope to forbidding discrimination in the 'mak[ing] and enforce[ment]' of contracts alone. Where an alleged act of discrimination does not involve the impairment of one of these specific rights, section 1981 provides no relief. Section 1981 cannot be construed as a general proscription of racial discrimination in all aspects of contract relations, for it expressly prohibits discrimination only in the making and enforcement of contracts." Slip opinion at 8.

Thus, a racially discriminatory refusal to hire, as one example, is covered by section 1981. But discrimination in the terms and conditions of employment, after the contract has been formed, is not covered.

This does not leave the plaintiff without avenues of relief for harassment on the job: both title VII and State law are available. Mr. President, I note that title VII prohibits discrimination, not only in hiring, that is in the formation of an employment contract, but also in the terms, conditions, and privileges of employment. As Justice Kennedy noted, racial harassment is cognizable under title VII. Indeed, the Court has already ruled title VII is applicable to sexual harassment. Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson, 477 U.S. 57 (1986). Slip opinion at p. 12, 13.

By this reasonable reading of section 1981, in the Court's words, "we may preserve the integrity of Title VII's procedures * * *" Slip opinion at 13. These procedures are detailed and are aimed at resolving disputes through conciliation rather than lawsuits. Congress emphasized administrative investigation, procedure, and conciliation in 1964 when it enacted title VII, and it is desirable not to vitiate the title VII scheme by rendering section 1981 totally coextensive with title VII.

If the broad mosaic of Federal and State civil rights laws, of which section 1981 is a part, is inadequate to the task of protecting equal opportunity, then a case needs to be made for change. If actual evidence can be presented that section 1981 needs refinement, I will carefully review such evidence.

Finally, Mr. President, I just want to mention the City of Richmond versus Croson case, decided on January 23, 1989. It involved a racial set-aside established by Richmond, VA, wherein at least 30 percent of city construction contracts had to go to firms owned by minorities. Minorities were defined as "Blacks, Spanish-speaking persons, Orientals, Indians, Eskimos or Aleuts."

In this case, five members of the Court made clear that the 14th amendment's guarantee of equal protection of the laws applies in the same fashion to persons of all races. In other words, State and local government discrimination against whites, as well as all other persons not covered under the Richmond set-aside plan, is to be judged by the same strict scrutiny applied to official discrimination against minorities preferred under the Richmond scheme. Is this a radical result? What is wrong in saying that "equal" means "equal"? Or that one's rights do not depend on the color of one's skin? What is wrong with that?

Moreover, the Court made clear that a generalized assertion of societal discrimination is not enough to justify reverse discrimination. Indeed, in this case, Richmond did not even have an arguable case of discrimination against Spanish-speaking persons, Orientals, Indians, Eskimos, or Aleuts in any part of the Richmond construction industry.

The Court also said that even in an extreme case of deliberate discrimination, which might justify properly tailored race-conscious relief under the Court's analysis, the city must first try race-neutral means of increasing minority business participation. Slip opinion at 31 (Justice O'Connor writing for herself and four other Justices). For example, the city could provide financing for all small contractors, regardless of race, which would certainly lead to greater minority contract opportunities. Slip opinion at 32.

In short, the set-aside in this case was not based on legitimate findings of actual discrimination in the Richmond construction industry, and the set-aside plan was not properly tailored as a remedy in any event.

CONCLUSION

In sum, Mr. President, the Wards Cove Packing Co. versus Antonio case is about whether proportional hiring, racial and gender preferences in employment, and reverse discrimination are to be the norm in this country. The Richmond case is about whether race should dictate the allocation of government contract opportunities in favor of some races and at the expense of others. The Wilks case is about procedural fairness. It says that all persons are entitled to their day in court when they believe their rights have been infringed.

We should not hide behind euphemisms or slogans when we argue about these cases. Let us debate the real issues arising from these decisions.

Moreover, Mr. President, if the Senate considers legislation reexamining some of these recent, reasonable decisions, I believe it will be necessary to reexamine other decisions as well. For example, the whole concept of so-called disparate impact-discrimination under Griggs v. Duke Power Co., 401 U.S. 424 (1971) would need to be reexamined. I think it is a very troublesome concept. Moreover, the decision in Steelworker v. Weber, 443 U.S. 193 (1979), would also need careful consideration. This case began the Court's tragic departure from evenhanded, equal justice under title VII by opening the door to outright reverse discrimination. Two years ago, three Justices of the Supreme Court said they would overrule Weber. Johnson v. Santa Clara County, 480 U.S. 616 (1987) (dissenting opinion of Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Rehnquist; dissenting opinion of Justice White). Two other Justices apparently believe Weber was wrongly decided but declined to vote to overrule it because of the principle of stare decisis. Johnson, supra (concurring opinion, Justice Stevens; concurring opinion, Justice O'Connor). Perhaps the Congress will have occasion to revisit that decision.

Finally, Mr. President, let me note that we have just witnessed the spectacle of the Judiciary Committee refusing to send a Presidential nominee, Bill Lucas, to the full Senate for consideration because he refused to be browbeaten into saying that these sensible Supreme Court decisions should be overturned. Bill Lucas reflected not only the opinion of the Attorney General, but the views of the President who nominated him, a President overwhelmingly elected by the people last November. I think, Mr. President, we should think twice before going any further down the road of imposing such a litmus test on Presidential nominees.

GEN. MOHAMED KABBAJ

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, on May 12, 1989, the world lost a great leader and a true Renaissance man. On that day, Gen. Mohamed Kabbaj, Commander of the Royal Moroccan Air Force, died after a long battle with cancer.

General Kabbaj was born in Casablanca in 1933. The son of a successful businessman and a determined mother, Kabbaj showed early signs of the intelligence and strength of character that would make him a national leader.

As a young man, he traveled to France as one of the first Moroccans to be selected to attend the French Air Force Academy. He graduated with honors and returned to Morocco in the late 1950's as the ranking man in the newly formed Air Force.

Kabbaj soon left the Air Force to become the first Moroccan copilot on Royal Air Maroc, the national airline of Morocco. He rapidly became a fully qualified pilot, and rose to the position of chief pilot and director of operations of Royal Air Maroc.

His flying skill was unparalleled. He was fully qualified in flying the old Carvelle, the later Boeing 707, 727, 737, and 747, and even the new 757. He flew the military airplanes and helicopters of many nations. In July 1986, he set the world distance record for a nonstop, nonrefueled, two-engine aircraft by flying the 4,900 miles from Seattle to Morocco.

In 1966, he was selected to serve as copilot of King Hassan's aircraft on the King's historic first visit to the Soviet Union. Kabbaj handled the aircraft with great skill when it encountered difficult flying conditions—and his performance so impressed the King that he appointed Kabbaj his permanent chief pilot.

It was to be a fateful decision. On August 16, 1972, Kabbaj was the commander of King Hassan's 727 when it was suddenly attacked by six renegade Moroccan fighter planes. The fighters riddled the King's plane with 182 bullet holes, concentrating their fire on the aircraft's cabin where they supposed the King to be riding.

Fortunately for the King, he was not in the cabin, but in the cockpit with his friend Kabbaj; and, even more fortunately, Kabbaj displayed a measure of heroism and grace under pressure on this occasion that saved both the aircraft and the King's life.

Kabbaj's skill in handling an aircraft deprived of its hydraulics as well as two of its engines proved to the King and all other observers what has also become clear to me in my friendship with him: That Mohamed Kabbaj is a man to be reckoned with.

Thanks to his presence of mind on that memorable occasion, King Hassan survived the coup that had been set in motion against him. And Kabbaj continued to serve his country with distinction.

Later that same month, the King promoted Kabbaj to Commander of the Royal Moroccan Air Force. He served in his capacity until his death, transforming the Air Force into one of the most effective small fighting forces in the world.

It is for this achievement that his countrymen are most grateful to him. But his military career was just one facet of this truly extraordinary individual.

He was a genuine intellectual who read voraciously in many languages. He was an expert in agriculture and a connoisseur of classical music. He had an extensive knowledge of both religious theory and Arabic culture and politics.

Kabbaj was a strong nationalist and a dedicated anti-Communist. His deep principles—and his dogged application of those principles to the technical details of governance—were a source of true inspiration to all who were fortunate enough to see him in action.

I spent many hours over a number of years with Mohamed Kabbaj. His analysis and insights into the Middle East were instructive, even brilliant. I am grateful for all I was able to learn from him.

I wish there were more people in this world like my friend Mohamed Kabbaj. I wish we in America had more statesmen of his caliber. Nor should we be hesistant to profit from his example—and treat important ideas with the respect they deserve from thinking and self-governing men.

I would also like to express my condolences and best wishes to Mohamed's widow, Mina, and his three children, Mohamed, Kenza, and Halima. He was a great man, and a model for all of us as we strive on to establish liberty and justice in this harsh world.

HOW TO KEEP THE ECONOMY ON TRACK

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, yesterday the Commerce Department reported that the Government's key gauge of future economic trends declined for the fourth time in the past 5 months.

Some economists and financial commentators believe an economic "soft landing" is both inevitable and necessary in order to keep inflation under control. But an economic downturn would not be good for America. There is no compelling reason to idle the Nation's productivity, throw Americans out of work, and halt the resurgence of U.S. industrial competitiveness. The only answer to our economic problems is faster—not slower—economic growth.

The Federal Reserve Board's monetary policy is responsible for the current weakness in our economy. Beginning in 1985 and extending through the early part of 1987, the Federal Reserve inflated the money supply as part of an effort to drive down the value of the dollar. This was done on the theory that a cheaper dollar would reduce the trade deficit by driving up the price of foreign imports. One of the byproducts of this was increased pressure on U.S. prices, as was predicted by monetarist economists.

Once Alan Greenspan replaced Paul Volcker as Fed Chairman, the Fed decided that it had to reduce the rate of growth of the money supply in order to return the Fed to its foremost objective—price stability. Unfortunately, but inevitably, restoring more prudent long-term monetary policy imposes short-term costs on the real economy. Tightening the money supply reduces the liquidity of the banking system, forcing a rise in short-term interest rates. Because of policy mistakes made 2 years ago, we may well be forced into a completely unnecessary economic downturn.

Mr. President, while the present Federal Reserve leadership has coped admirably with the inflationary legacy of its predecessor, there are signs that the Fed continues to pay homage to the Phillips curve theory which postulates an inexorable tradeoff between inflation and unemployment. This is clear from public statements by Fed officials to the effect that the economy cannot grow more than 2½ to 3 percent without accelerating inflation. Because of this bias against rapid economic growth, the Fed may well have overcompensated in its fight against inflation.

The idea behind the Phillips curve is that a robust economy eventually uses up the work force and its capacity to produce goods and services. As a consequence, workers bid up wages and employers raise prices, leading to an increase in inflation. The Phillips curve thus postulates that low inflation can only be achieved by reducing economic growth and increasing unemployment.

But the Phillips curve has been discredited by economic history. During the Reagan years, the United States experienced a simultaneous reduction in both inflation and unemployment. Japan and Switzerland, which both have less than 2 percent unemployment and less than 2 percent inflation, also prove that low inflation and full employment are entirely compatible.

The key point to understand is that inflation is a monetary phenomenon. Inflation is caused by too much money chasing too few goods, not by too many American workers. A recession doesn't increase the production of goods and services, and thus cannot help in the fight against inflation.

In 1988, the U.S. economy boomed. However, as a result of the Fed's monetary policy in 1988 and the beginning of 1989, interest rates rose significantly. Indeed, short-term interest rates in March 1989 had risen more than 3 percentage points over the previous 12 months, and yield curve had been either flat or inverted for most of 1989.

Mr. President, the Fed's policy mistakes are beginning to have a negative impact on the economy. Several key economic variables such as factory orders, consumer spending, auto sales and commodity prices displayed a disturbing weakness in recent months.

If economic growth is halted or reversed, it will have an immediate impact on American workers and businesses. Although the unemployment rate would probably not reach the 10.7 percent peak during the 1982 recession, it could easily rise to 8.0 percent. With reduced sales and cash flow, businesses will be forced to cut back or cease operations altogether. Bankruptcy rates will rise, hitting small businesses and farmers especially hard. Lenders will be left holding the bag. A downturn would make it much more difficult for new business startups.

The impact of Fed policy is not limited to the economy: Our efforts to reduce the budget deficit without significantly raising taxes will be seriously jeopardized. A weakening economy and rising unemployment mean lower tax receipts and higher social spending. According to the Congressional Budget Office, a 1 percentage point reduction in real GNP growth in 1990 will increase the projected fiscal 1991 deficit by $24 billion.

A slowdown will be the result of Government policy errors, not fundamental problems in the private economy. Congress must enact progrowth legislative measures to revive the economy—and move it into higher gear. Here's a list of measures we ought to take immediately to avoid a recession and keep the economy on track:

Reject any legislation that increases taxes. Today's Federal tax burden on the economy is already too high at 19.6 percent of GNP—the fourth highest in U.S. history. Adding new tax burdens to our fragile economy would only exacerbate a downturn.

Cut the capital gains tax and index inflationary gains to increase productive incentives, and spur investment. Also, enhanced productivity from a tax cut would reduce inflationary pressures. In addition, a rate cut would offset some of the revenue decline the Treasury will experience if a full blown recession develops.

Immediately enact enterprise zones and an earned income tax credit expansion to stimulate job growth in our inner cities to help cushion the impact of a slowdown on the working poor.

Enact budget process reforms such as enhanced rescission, line-item veto, current services baseline reform, balanced budget amendment to keep a lid on the budget deficit.

Repeal the burdensome section 89 uniform benefits regulations. The administrative burden of section 89 is reducing the productivity of America's small businesses—and the availability of health benefits for American workers.

Reform U.S. product liability laws to reduce costs for American products and enhance innovation by small firms. The costs of unnecessary litigation are a burden on U.S. industry that our competitors do not face.

Reform the Fed's practices and procedures to provide more openness and accountability in the conduct of monetary policy. In this regard, Congress should consider legislation such as the Federal Reserve Reform Act—originally introduced by ex-Representative Jack Kemp, Republican of New York, in 1984—and recently reintroduced by Representatives LEE HAMILTON, Democrat, of Indiana, and BYRON DORGAN, Democrat of North Dakota, to remove the dangerous shroud which now shields the Feds actions from the public.

Stabilize monetary policy with an objective rule. In this regard, Congress might consider legislation requiring the Fed to rely on commodity prices to guide monetary policy. An objective rule would ensure long-term noninflationary economic growth.

The key element of all these policies is compassion—the recognition that the poorest Americans suffer most from a recession, even if we dress it up as a "soft landing." Instead of heaping even more burdens on these threatened people, we ought to be actively seeking progrowth solutions.

Mr. President, the Fed's efforts to engineer a soft landing may tilt us into an entirely unnecessary recession. While we still have time to prevent this economic disaster, for working men and women all over this country, it's getting much too close for comfort.

CAPITAL GAINS IS A BIPARTISAN ISSUE

Mr. KASTEN. Mr. President, many political analysts and commentators have characterized the capital gains debate as a strictly partisan debate between Republicans and Democrats.

This characterization is false. Capital gains is a bipartisan issue.

Over the years, Democrats and Republicans worked together to keep capital gains taxes low in order to promote economic growth and job creation. President John F. Kennedy advocated a reduction in the capital gains tax to 19.6 percent. In 1978, the successful effort to slash the capital gains tax from 50 to 28 percent was spearheaded by Republicans like Representative BILL ARCHER and the late Representative Bill Steiger—and Democrats like Senator LLOYD BENTSEN and former Representative Jim Jones.

Today in the Senate, a capital gains tax reduction is supported by Members from across the political spectrum—from ALAN CRANSTON, DALE BUMPERS, and DENNIS DECONCINI to RUDY BOSCHWITZ, STEVE SYMMS, and me. And a bipartisan majority of the House Ways and Means Committee is on the verge of approving a significant cut in the gains tax.

Mr. President, in a letter to the Wall Street Journal, Representative MICHAEL ANDREWS, a Democratic member of the Ways and Means Committee and a staunch supporter of a capital gains differential, explains why the capital gains debate is a bipartisan debate—and how a tax cut will benefit all Americans. Representative ANDREWS notes that capital gains "is not a Republican idea or a Democratic idea. It is an idea that makes sense for America." I hope my colleagues will remember Mr. ANDREW's words when the Senate considers the capital gains issue next month.

I ask unanimous consent that Representative ANDREW's letter be entered at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CAPITAL GAINS: A BIPARTISAN ISSUE

The capital-gains debate has veered badly off track. The issue has become embroiled in partisan politics as opponents have charged that rate reduction would be unfair and would benefit only a small segment of taxpayers. As a Democrat on the Ways and Means Committee, I believe a capital-gains differential benefits all Americans. The real issues in the debate have nothing to do with privilege or partisanship. The real issues are economic, and they are very important: growth in America's productivity, strengthening our ability to compete for expanding world markets, and the creation of new jobs and opportunities for our workers.

For more than a generation Democrats and Republicans have understood that it makes good economic sense to provide incentives for those who place capital at risk as part of the effort to create a growing, dynamic, competitive American economy. In his 1963 message to Congress calling for a monumental tax-reduction bill, President Kennedy asked for a maximum tax on capital gains of 19.5% on individuals and 22% on corporations. In words that ring true today, President Kennedy pointed out that the existing higher tax on capital gains was "both inequitable and a barrier to economic growth."

Over the years capital-gains initiatives in Congress have benefited from strong bipartisan support. For example, in 1978 when the exclusion of capital gains from taxable income was raised from 50% to 60%, the initiative was not viewed as partisan. In fact it was led in the Senate by Democrats Russell Long and Alan Cranston as well as many Republicans.

Reduced taxation of capital gains has a proven record of success in helping to build a stronger American economy. Lower capital rates help encourage entrepreneurs to commit their resources to the newer, risky ventures that may fail, but when successful can produce the jobs and exports of the future. They also will provide a powerful incentive for savings and investment at precisely the time our economy most needs it. Countries that save less invest less, and gradually lose their ability to compete. Net U.S. savings averaged only 5.3% of gross domestic product over 1973 to 1986 compared with 10.3% in West Germany and 18.6% in Japan.

The capital cost of investment in new equipment is an important factor in any country's ability to compete, and restoration of a capital-gains tax rate can help bring that cost down in the U.S. Captial costs in this country are twice as high as in Japan and substantially higher then those in most other industrrial nations.

Our foreign competitors long have recognized the important link among low capital-gains taxation, economic growth and international competiveness. Most either do not tax capital gains at all or tax them only lightly. In our own country the potential positive impact of reduced capital-gains taxation can be enormous; one recent study suggests that a permanent reduction of the capital-gains tax rate to 15% would lower the capital cost of investing in now equipment by 14%.

For 25 years Republicans and Democrats, in Congress and in the White House, generally have supported a capital-gains tax rate and the U.S. economy has benefited as a result. Recently, however, it has been suggested that a capital-gains rate is "unfair" because a disproportionate share of the benefit would go to taxpayers earning more than $200,000 a year. In fact, there are many more taxpayers with moderate incomes who realize capital gains than there are in the higher-income brackets. Three-fourths of all tax returns with capital gains were reported by taxpayers with wage and salary incomes of less than $50,000, and nearly half of all capital-gains go to people with incomes under $50,000.

In addition, it should be noted that our capital-gains tax-cut proposal is highly progressive. Most of the revenues gained from our proposed cut will come from upper-income taxpayers, but most of the proceeds will be used for programs that benefit those with lower incomes: expansions of the earned income credit to assist child care, the low-income housing credit, employer-provided education assistance, targeted jobs tax credit, and health insurance for the self-employed.

Partisan politics really has no place in the debate over an economic issue as important as reducing the capital-gains tax rate. The capital-gains proposal supported by a majority in the Ways and Means Committee, is not a Republican idea or a Democratic idea. It is an idea that makes sense for America.

MICHAEL A. ANDREWS,
Member of Congress.

WASHINGTON.

WNP-1 CONVERSION—CASTING A LONG OMINOUS SHADOW OVER THE U.S. COMMITMENT TO NUCLEAR NONPROLIFERATION

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, more than 10 years have passed since the need for new tritium production capability was identified publicly as a high priority national problem. During the intervening decade, a series of blue ribbon committees, study groups and advisory boards have commented extensively on the need to begin new construction of such capabiltiy. At the same time, other advisory groups have been pointing out the health and safety problems at existing facilities, lending a note or urgency to this nation's need to build new production facilities.

Last year, the Department of Energy finally developed and recommended to Congress a strategy that rejected the use of existing civilian light water reactors in favor of a dual technology production capability.

In spite of the general agreement concerning the prudency of this strategy, several of the options which were rejected in this decade of study and debate are once again being touted by their political, technical, and economic beneficiaries, without consideration to their overall budgetary or national security implications. We continue to see articles, press releases and open politicking for these alternatives, spite the well-documented technical and or policy deficiencies.

For whatever reason, the General Accounting Office in particular, appears to be actively lobbying various Members of Congress to encourage or even force reconsideration of the decision not to convert the unfinished commercial light water reactor [LWR] Washington Public Power Supply System's WNP-1, to a defense production reactor. The argument for this conversion is based primarily on an illusion that this partially completed facility can be converted and operated as a defense production plant more quickly and at less than the selected options. The proponents of the WNP-1 reactor gloss over the very serious technical and safety questions which have been raised time and time again in a variety of congressional and executive branch forums, to say nothing of the murky legal issues involved.

Even more importantly, the proponents of the reactor's conversion have not come to grips with the international political implications of the conversion of a standard, commercial power reactor to a weapons material production reactor. It has been my belief that such an action would set a highly undesirable precedent from an industry which has striven so diligently to technically and emotionally separate its product from the specter of nuclear weaponry. With over 300 similar power production reactors all around the world, many in comparable states of completion, the conversion of WNP-1 would cast a long ominous shadow over this country's commitment to nuclear nonproliferation.

Mr. President, proponents of the conversion of this civilian reactor to defense purposes are quick to point out both the State Department and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency have concluded conversion of WNP-1 would not violate U.S. commitments under the NPT. However, it seems to me that conclusion is based on the letter of the law, not the spirit, and as all of us here in Washington have painfully learned over and over again, it is perception, not simple reality, that usually wins in any contest between the two.

For that reason, I asked the Congressional Research Service [CRS] to prepare an independent analysis of "The Potential Effects on U.S. Non-Proliferation Policy If DOE Were to Acquire and Use the Incomplete WNP-1 Nuclear Powerplant to Produce Tritium and or Plutonium for Nuclear Weapons."

I am releasing this analysis today. The author, Warren H. Donnelly, concludes that the conversion of the WNP-1, originally intended for peaceful use, to a defense production facility could weaken the ability of the United States to secure a favorable extension of the Non-Proliferation Treaty in 1995.

In the report, Donnelly addresses this contest between perception and reality. He notes, as I have, that the conversion option does not appear to violate the letter of any U.S. treaty commitments or the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended but, states unequivocally, "It could be seen as contrary to the conditions the United States has imposed on many other states through its agreements for nuclear cooperation.

This CRS analysis has also determined there is an undeniable potential for the WNP-1 conversion "To work to the disadvantage of U.S. policies to prevent the further spread of proliferation of nuclear weapons."

Of course, as Donnelly notes, these impacts cannot be predicted with any certainty. Much depends on events in the Soviet Union and the relations between that country and the United States. However, the laws and statements on which he based his conclusions are sound.

To summarize these: Since the first use of atomic weapons in 1945, the United States has led the world in efforts that would prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons. This policy is defined domestically in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, and internationally in the statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Treaty on Non-Proliferation [NPT]. These do not specifically limit the U.S. production of special materials. However, the United States was the prime mover in establishing the IAEA and its statutes such as article II that states:

The agency shall seek to accelerate and enlarge the contribution of atomic energy to peace, health and prosperity throughout the world. It shall ensure, so far as it is able, that assistance provided by it or at its request or under its supervision or control is not used in such a way as to further any military purposes.

The NPT is the heart of our present policy and, as Donnelly notes, proliferation is not explicitly defined in it. However, this treaty represents a bargain between three nuclear weapons states—the United States, the Soviet Union, and the United Kingdom—and nonnuclear weapons states. In this bargain, the nuclear weapons states agreed not to help other states get nuclear weapons, to recognize the "inalienable rights" of all parties to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and their access to related nuclear cooperation. The nonnuclear weapons states took a nonnuclear weapons pledge and agreed, essentially, that there would not be diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons.

The Atomic Energy Act of 1954 opened the way for civil use of nuclear energy in the United States and reversed a ban on nuclear cooperation with other countries by actually authorizing U.S. agreement for nuclear cooperation with other countries. Two of the specific conditions required guarantees that the United States supply items and any material transferred would not be used for atomic weapons or for research or development of atomic weapons or for any other military purpose.

CRS points out that the concept of separation of civil and military nuclear facilities has long been a part of nonproliferation thinking and is now widely accepted as a fundamental principle. It is implicit in the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act, is explicit in the Hart-Simpson amendment, and more recently was endorsed by the Reagan administration in the 1985 NPT Review Conference. At that time, the United States agreed to a final declaration that endorsed the principle of total separation of civil and military uses.

Donnelly predicts that for the United States to take a facility originally intended for civilian generation of nuclear power and potentially open to IAEA safeguards, and to use that facility to make material for nuclear weapons probably would be seen by some nonweapons states as two-faced and discriminatory.

Mr. President, there is a great deal of substance to the CRS analysis conducted by Mr. Donnelly. I believe it makes crystal clear, as Mr. Donnelly concluded—

That the conversion of WNP-1 would be regarded by many in the world as chipping away at the carefully erected wall between civilian and military uses of nuclear energy and blurring the distinction between civil and weapons applications of nuclear energy.

I would also note that this distinction is not observed in the Soviet Union. We know that even though the Soviets have recently announced a shutdown of three production reactors, they can continue to meet their materials requirements for nuclear weapons materials by using civilian reactors. They have the technical ability to do that and have no restrictions on producing weapons materials in civilian reactors. This makes it very difficult for the United States to evaluate the intentions behind the Soviets' so-called good faith gesture. I believe that the United States must stick to its tried and true policy of strict separation of civilian and military functions, and not do anything that would suggest that, out of desperation, we were abandoning this policy and moving toward the Soviet model.

Mr. President, I do understand why some Members of Congress are continuing to push for this conversion. However, I fear this effort to resurrect an idea already thoroughly evaluated and discarded will only distract Congress and DOE from its more important and immediate concerns. This Nation does not have the luxury of another decade of committees, panels, and studies. We must get on with the business of implementing our carefully chosen strategy.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Congressional Research Service report, titled "The Potential Effects on U.S. Non-Proliferation Policy If DOE Were To Acquire and Use the Incomplete WNP-1 Nuclear Power Plant To Produce Tritium and or Plutonium for Nuclear Weapons," be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD after my statement.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

POTENTIAL EFFECTS ON U.S. NON-PROLIFERATION POLICY IF DOE WERE TO ACQUIRE AND USE THE INCOMPLETE WNP-1 NUCLEAR POWER PLANT TO PRODUCE TRITIUM AND, OR, PLUTONIUM FOR NUCLEAR WEAPONS

(An analysis prepared for Senator James A. McClure by Warren H. Donnelly, Senior Specialist, June 13, 1989)

SUMMARY—CONCLUDING COMMENT

To produce nuclear weapons materials with a nuclear power plant, the WNP-1 unit, originally intended for peaceful use to produce tritium and or plutonium weapons probably would be regarded by many within the United States and abroad as chipping away at the carefully erected wall between civil and military uses of nuclear energy and blurring the distinction between civil and weapons applications of nuclear energy. It could also provide an undesirable example of conversion of a civil nuclear power plant to the production of nuclear weapons materials; perhaps open a loophole in the nuclear verification system of the International Atomic Energy Agency (safeguards); cause Australia and Canada to question whether uranium they have previously supplied to the United States might in some way be used to produce nuclear weapons materials; and perhaps weaken the ability of the United States to secure a favorable extension of the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in 1995.

While the WNP-1 option does not appear to violate the letter of any U.S. treaty commitment or the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended, it could be seen as contrary to the conditions that the United States has imposed on many other states through its agreements for nuclear cooperation. On the other hand, advocates of the WNP-1 option are likely to point out that the unit never has been operated for civil applications, that it is located on a DOE reservation, that change in its planned use would be done openly, and that measures could be undertaken to mitigate adverse preceptions.

That the potential of the WNP-1 option could work to the disadvantage of U.S. policies to prevent the further spread, or proliferation of nuclear weapons is undeniable.

However, their impacts cannot now be predicted with any certainty. The potential effects are likely to depend upon future circumstances, particularly the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union and the state of their nuclear arms reduction negotiations. If tensions between the two superpowers are low and they agree upon substantial nuclear arms reduction, then choosing the WNP-1 option probably would have little effect. On the other hand, if Soviet-American relations worsen and nuclear arms reduction negotiations stalemate, then nonweapons states and various public interest groups at home and abroad would be expected to be critical of the WNP-1 option. If so, U.S. influence over future directions for world non-proliferation policy might be weakened, which could make it more difficult the United States to achieve its long standing goal of preventing the further spread of nuclear weapons and the ability to make them.

THE REQUEST

On May 9, 1989, your offices requested an analysis of the potential effects of U.S. non-proliferation policy if DOE were to acquire, complete and operate the now incomplete nuclear weapons plant of the Washington Public Power Supply Co (WNP-1) to produce tritium and, or, plutonium for use in U.S. nuclear weapons.

The following analysis presents some background on nuclear weapons materials and their production by the Department of Energy, and the proposal that DOE acquire, complete and operate the WNP-1 nuclear power plant to produce tritium or plutonium; describes principal features of U.S. policy to avoid the further spread, or proliferation, of nuclear arsenals; and then analyzes potential effects could reasonably be expected to follow from this proposed DOE action. Note, this analysis is limited to the non-proliferation aspects of the WNP-1 proposal and does not include national security, technical or economic factors.

BACKGROUND

Production of nuclear weapons materials

The Department of Energy produces and services nuclear warheads for U.S. nuclear weapons. To this end produces the nuclear fissionable material plutonium which is used in most U.S. weapons, and also a related material, tritium, which can substantially increase the energy release, or "yield," of nuclear warheads.[1]

At present, all of DOE's reactors for production of plutonium and tritium are shut down indefinitely. These include the N-reactor at DOE's Hanford Plant which has produced plutonium and some tritium, but is now shut down pending possible rehabilitation; and the three reactors at DOE's Savannah River Plant which until last year were producing tritium, but are now shut down for review of safety. DOE has proposed construction of two new production reactors and possible restart of the Savannah River reactors.

The WNP-1 Proposal

The Department of Energy has been considering various options to resume production of tritium and perhaps of plutonium. One is for DOE to acquire the partially completed WNP-1 unit of the Washington Public Power System which is located at DOE's Hanford site; to complete it, with appropriate modifications, and to operate it for production of tritium and or plutonium and perhaps for generation of electricity. This 1250 Megawatt electric plant has a Babcock and Wilcox nuclear steam system, is 63 percent complete, and was being built by Bechtel.

The construction to date was authorized by a construction permit of the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission. However, it seems unlikely that DOE would complete and operate the plant as an NRC licensed facility. So DOE and the NRC probably would have to arrange for termination of the NRC construction permit. This action would be highly visible to the public.

The Foundations of U.S. Non-proliferation Policy

Since the first use of atomic weapons in 1945, and especially since India tested a nuclear explosive in 1974, the United States has led world efforts to prevent the further spread of nuclear weapons. This remains a cardinal feature of U.S. policy. The formal basis for U.S. non-proliferation policy is to be found in international treaties and statutes and in domestic legislation. The international basis lies in the statute of the International Atomic Energy agency and the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT). The domestic basis is found notably in the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978.

With one exception, none of these limit how the U.S. can produce nuclear weapons or the enriched uranium, plutonium and tritium with which to make them. The exception is the Hart-Simpson amendment, described below, which in effect bars transfer of plutonium under a license of the U.S Nuclear Regulatory Commission to the Department of Energy for weapons use. Nonetheless, the potential effects of the WNP-1 proposal on U.S. non-proliferation policy give reason to briefly describe the bases of U.S. policy.

The Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency

This international statute entered into force in 1957, with the United States a prime mover in the negotiations for the Statute. The objective of the agency, which the United States approved, is stated in Article II as follows:

The Agency shall seek to accelerate and enlarge the contribution of atomic energy to peace, health and prosperity throughout the world. It shall ensure, so far as it is able, that assistance provided by it or at its request or under its supervision or control is not used in such a way as to further any military purpose.

The Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons

The non-proliferation treaty (NPT) is at the heart of current U.S. policy. That the United States and the Soviet Union could collaborate on this treaty at a time when their other relations were strained is testimony to the importance attached by both to stopping the further spread of nuclear weapons. Opened for signature in 1968, the NPT entered into force in 1970.

Proliferation is not explicitly defined in the NPT. However, the non-proliferation commitments of the nuclear-weapons and non-nuclear-weapons states provide an implicit meaning, which is to receive nuclear weapons or explosives or control over them directly or indirectly, or to manufacture or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices. This implicitly would allow non-explosive military uses of nuclear energy such as nuclear engines for submarines and warships. Note, the NPT definition does not extend to spread of capacity to produce nuclear weapons materials by non-nuclear-weapons states. For U.S. purposes, Congress in 1978 expanded the meaning of nuclear proliferation to include the latter.

The treaty represents a bargain between three nuclear weapons states—the United States, the Soviet Union, and the United Kingdom—and non-nuclear-weapons parties.

The nuclear weapons states agreed not to help other states get nuclear weapons;[2] to recognize the "inalienable right" of all parties to use nuclear energy for peaceful purposes and their access to related nuclear cooperation;[3] and, together with other parties to the treaty, to ". . . undertake to pursue negotiations in good faith on effective measures relating to cessation of the nuclear arms race at an early date and to nuclear disarmament, and on a treaty on general and complete disarmament under strict and effective international control." [4]

For their part, the non-nuclear-weapons states took a no-nuclear weapons pledge,[5] and accepted safeguards for the ". . . exclusive purpose of verification of the fulfillment of its obligations assumed under this treaty with a view to preventing diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices." [6] The safeguards shall be applied on ". . . all source or special fissionable material in all peaceful nuclear activities within the territory of such State, under its jurisdiction, or carried out under its control anywhere." [7]

[1] Plutonium is a fissionable material that can be made into nuclear weapons. It is a heavy, slightly radioactive element that is made by exposing the isotope uranium-238 to neutrons in a reactor and then chopping up exposed U-238 and chemically separating the plutonium (reprocessing). Tritium is a radioactive form of hydrogen which is made by exposing lithium-6 to neutrons in a reactor and then recovering the tritium from the lithium "target." Tritium has a comparatively short half-live of 12.26 years which means that about 5.5 percent of the atoms present undergo radioactive decay in a year. As a result, tritium must be periodically replenished for those warheads in which it is used to increase their yield.

[2] Article I provides that: "Each nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty undertakes not to transfer to any recipient whatsoever nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices or control over such weapons or explosive devices directly or indirectly; and not in any way to assist, encourage, or induce any non-nuclear-weapon State to manufacture, or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices, or control over such weapons or explosive devices.

[3] Article IV-1 provides that: "Nothing in this Treaty shall be interpreted as affecting the inalienable right of all the Parties to the Treaty to develop research, production and use of nuclear energy for peaceful purposes without discrimination and in conformity with Articles I and II of this Treaty."

Article IV-2 provides that: "All the Parties to the Treaty undertake to facilitate and have the right to participate in, the fullest possible exchange of equipment, materials, and scientific and technological information for peaceful uses of nuclear energy. . . ."

[4] Article VI.

[5] Article II provides that: "Each non-nuclear-weapon State Party to the Treaty undertakes not to receive the transfer from any transferee whatsoever of nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices or of control over such weapons or explosive devices directly, or indirectly; not to manufacture or otherwise acquire nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices; and not to seek or receive any assistance in the manufacture of nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices.

[6] Article III-1.

[7] Article III-1.

In addition, all Parties agree to require IAEA safeguards be applied to their nuclear exports to non-weapons states.[8]

The Atomic Energy Act of 1946

In this then radical legislation, Congress sought to keep the secret of the atom bomb by cutting off U.S. nuclear cooperation with its allies; by government control of the production, ownership and use of fissionable material; and by a ban on nuclear cooperation with other nations with respect to use of atomic energy for industrial purposes until Congress declared by joint resolution that ". . . effective and enforceable international safeguards against the use of atomic energy for destructive purposes have been established."[9]

The Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as Amended

Following President Eisenhower's Atoms-for-Peace speech in 1953, Congress rewrote U.S. atomic energy legislation. The 1954 Act opened the way for civil use of nuclear energy in the United States by permitting private ownership of reactors and related facilities although the government kept title to the fissionable materials used in and produced by them.[10] The Act also reversed the earlier ban on nuclear cooperation with other countries by providing for a "program of international cooperation to promote the common defense and security and to make available to cooperating nations the benefits of peaceful applications of atomic energy as widely as expanding technology and considerations of the common defense and security will permit."[11] Going further, the Act authorized U.S. agreements for nuclear cooperation with other countries. Two of the specified conditions required guaranties in such agreements that safeguards be maintained for U.S. supplied items and that any materials transferred would not be used for ". . . atomic weapons or for research on or development of atomic weapons or for any other military purpose."[12] In addition, U.S. nuclear exports for peaceful purposes would have to be licensed by the then U.S. Atomic Energy Commission—this function later was inherited by the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978

In the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (NNPA) Congress made a major addition to U.S. non-proliferation policy. In effect, it expanded the definition of proliferation to include the spread of the ". . . direct capability to manufacture or otherwise acquire such devices . . ."[13] Accordingly, it was U.S. policy to: ". . . actively pursue through international initiatives . . . the establishment of more effective international controls over the transfer and use of nuclear materials and equipment and nuclear technology for peaceful purposes in order to prevent proliferation . . ."[14]

In another policy statement, the NNPA committed the United States to ". . . continued strong support for the principles of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, to a strengthened International Atomic Energy Agency, and to a comprehensive safeguards system administered by the Agency to deter proliferation.[15] Additionally, the NNPA required as a condition of continued U.S. nuclear cooperation with non-weapons states the maintenance of IAEA safeguards for ". . . all peaceful nuclear activities in, under the jurisdiction of, or carried out under the control of such state at the time of the export."[16] Furthermore, the NNPA specified nine requirements to be added to U.S. agreements for nuclear cooperation. These included a pledge not to use U.S. nuclear cooperation for any nuclear explosive device or for any other military purpose, and various controls over what could be done with information and items furnished under an agreement.[17]

The Hart-Simpson Amendment to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954

Among the many amendments to the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, one is particularly relevant to the WNP-1 proposal. In 1982 the Secretary of Energy Edwards suggested that plutonium from spent power reactor fuel be recovered by DOE and used for nuclear weapons. The reaction of Congress was to legislate to preserve the separation of civil and military applications of nuclear energy. This they did by approving an amendment introduced by Senators Hart and Simpson to Sec. 57(e) of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954.[18] It provides that special nuclear material—i.e. plutonium—produced in reactors licensed by the NRC may not be ". . . transferred, reprocessed, used or otherwise made available by any instrumentality of the United States or any other person for nuclear explosive purposes." Its purpose was to prevent the Department of Energy from acquiring and reprocessing spent fuel from civil nuclear power reactors to recover its plutonium for nuclear weapons production. A bill has been introduced recently to extend the Hart-Simpson amendment to include tritium produced in an NRC licensed facility.[19]

IAEA Safeguards

Ever since the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) was established in 1957 and more so after the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons entered into force in 1970, the United States has strongly supported the IAEA's function of verifying that nuclear facilities and materials in non-weapons states are used only for peaceful purposes. Congress amplified this feature of U.S. non-proliferation policy in Sec. 201 of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978, P.L. 95-242, (NNPA), which states:

"[t]he United States is committed to continued strong support for the principles of the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons, to a strengthened and more effective International Atomic Energy Agency and to a comprehensive safeguards system administered by the Agency to deter proliferation."

Going further, sec. 306 of the NNPA Congress requires full-scope IAEA safeguards as a condition for U.S. nuclear exports to non-weapons states.[20]

Ideally, for non-proliferation policy, all nuclear materials in a non-weapons state should be under IAEA safeguards. As a matter of practice this is the situation for non-weapons NPT states. However there is a potential loophole in the NPT safeguards systems which could allow a non-weapons state to possess and use weapons grade nuclear materials outside of safeguards.

In more detail, non-weapons NPT states have pledged under Article II not to receive or make nuclear weapons or nuclear explosive devices. However, this pledge does not extend to non-explosive military uses of atomic energy, such as naval nuclear propulsion. Article III binds them to accept IAEA safeguards, with "a view to preventing diversion of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices"—but not non-explosive military uses—as set forth in an agreement with the agency.[21]

Conditions for IAEA safeguards agreements with non-weapons NPT states are specified in a model agreement printed in the agency's information circular INFCIRC/153 of 1971. The model agreement provides for "non-application of safeguards to nuclear material to be used in non-peaceful activities."[22]

While this loophole has yet to be opened, recent events as discussed later have called attention to its existence.

[8] Article III-2 provides that: "Each State Party to the Treaty undertakes not to provide: (a) source or special fissionable material, or (b) equipment or material especially designed or prepared for the processing, use or production of special fissionable material, to any non-nuclear-weapon State for peaceful purposes, unless the source or special fissionable material shall be subject to the safeguards required by this article."

[21] Article II provides as follows:

1. Each non-nuclear-weapons State Party to the Treaty undertakes to accept safeguards, as set forth in an agreement to be negotiated and concluded with the International Atomic Energy Agency in accordance with the Statute of the International Atomic Energy Agency and the Agency's safeguards system, for the exclusive purpose of verification of the fulfillment of its obligations assumed under this Treaty with a view to preventing diversions of nuclear energy from peaceful uses to nuclear weapons or other nuclear explosive devices.

The U.S.-IAEA Safeguard Agreement

In 1978 the U.S.-IAEA Safeguards Agreement took effect and opened peaceful U.S. nuclear facilities to IAEA inspection and safeguards. The purpose of this U.S. voluntary offer was to encourage "widespread adherence to the Treaty by demonstrating to non-nuclear-weapons States that they would not be placed at a commercial disadvantage by reason of the application of safeguards pursuant to the Treaty." [23] The U.S. may add or remove facilities from this list as it deems appropriate.[24]

ANALYSIS

The following analysis addresses the potential implications of the WNP-1 option for U.S. non-proliferation policy. As noted earlier, it does not include national security, technical or economic factors bearing upon this option. Also, since the analysis deals with the future and a wide range of possible reactions to this option, it inevitably is somewhat subjective and suffers from the uncertainties of any attempt to deal with the future.

Potential effect on the principle of separation of civil and military uses of atomic energy.

Background

The idea that civil and military applications of nuclear facilities and materials should be kept separated long has been part of non-proliferation thinking and is now widely accepted as a fundamental principle. It is implicit in the NNPA,[25] is explicit in the Hart-Simpson amendment, and more recently was endorsed by the Reagan administration. Concerning the last, in 1985 the U.S. representative to the 1985 NPT Review Conference agreed to a final declaration that endorsed the principle of total separation of civil and military uses. In discussing the importance of voluntary international inspection (IAEA safeguards) in nuclear weapons states, the final document said:

". . . To this end, the Conference recognizes the value of voluntary offers and recommends further evaluation of the economic and practical possibility of extending the application of safeguards to additional civil facilities in nuclear-weapons states as and when IAEA resources permit, and consideration of separation of the civil and military facilities in the nuclear weapons states.[26]

Analysis

For the U.S. to take a facility originally intended for civil generation of nuclear power and potentially open to IAEA safeguards, and to use that facility to make materials for nuclear weapons probably would be seen by some non-weapons states, especially those critical of U.S. nonproliferation policy, as two-faced, and discriminatory. States that come to mind include Argentina, Brazil, Pakistan, and, especially, India.[27] None of these have taken the NPT's no-weapons pledge and except for Brazil, all have one or more heavy water type nuclear power reactors which can readily be operated to produce weapons grade plutonium. On the other hand, some analysts might argue that the fact that the facility was never completed or used for civilian power generating purposes, is located on a DOE reservation, and is apparently surplus as far as civilian power needs go mitigates this perception. Additionally, the treaties and statutes noted earlier do not explicitly bar the United States from exercising this option.

The large size of the WNP-1 plant and the publicity likely to attend its acquisition and operation by DOE however could give these dissident states a new argument to resist future U.S. non-proliferation initiatives. The potential effects for U.S. non-proliferation interests would depend upon future circumstances. Effects could range from a minor irritant in future U.S. discussions to substantial resistance to some future U.S. non-proliferation initiatives.

Potential effect on IAEA safeguards: Opening a loophole

Background

As noted earlier, a non-weapons NPT state can use nuclear materials for non-explosive applications, most notably naval propulsion. However, material in such use cannot be safeguarded by the IAEA because its authority is limited to materials in peaceful uses. To date this potential loophole has not been opened, but there was concern among some analysts and scholars when the Canadian government proposed in 1988 to build a fleet of nuclear submarines. While this project has since been dropped by the Mulroney government, it could have led to a situation where Canada, a non-weapons NPT state, would have a substantial amount of weapons grade uranium contained in the fuel for these submarines not under IAEA safeguard and theoretically available for diverson.

Analysis

The WNP-1 option would not help and might weaken U.S. influence to get all non-weapons states to keep their nuclear materials under IAEA safeguards. It would involve removing nuclear materials in the fuel for WNP-1 from NRC safeguards, an action that some states could see as indicating the United States might have a relaxed attitude about use of this loophole, and by others as another instance of U.S. discrimination in its treatment of weapons and non-weapons states.

A complication is that had the WNP-1 plant been completed and put into civil operation, it would have been added to the list of U.S. nuclear facilities available for IAEA inspection under the U.S.-IAEA safeguards agreement of 1978.[28] Removing a civil nuclear facility from the list of such facilities in order to use it for weapons purposes would be viewed by many as a bad precedent, even in a nuclear-weapons state. Some might characterize it as an indication that the United States is willing to put its nuclear weapons interests ahead of its non-proliferation interests.

More to the point, there remains uneasiness that Argentina and Brazil with their unsafeguarded laboratory scale uranium enrichment equipment might point to this loophole as reason to resist U.S. pressure to put their output under IAEA safeguards.

Proponents of this option would probably point to the fact that this change in the planned use of the facility would be made openly, that it does not represent a real conversion since this plant has not been licensed for civilian use, and that measures could be taken to mitigate adverse perceptions of other countries.

Potential effect on U.S. non-military use for Australian and Canadian uranium

Background

As noted earlier, nuclear fuel for the WNP-1 probably would be fabricated by a commercial U.S. fuel fabricator. These fabricators keep working inventories of enriched uranium on hand, which from time to time might contain uranium imported from Australia or Canada. Under the revised U.S. agreements for nuclear cooperation with these countries, the U.S. has pledged not to use imports from them for explosive or any military purpose, and to apply IAEA safeguards to them.[29]

Analysis

In this situation, Australia and Canada might well request U.S. assurances that none of their uranium has been incorporated in the fuel for the WNP-1. This could be [23] Agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency for Application of Safeguards in the United States of America, with Protocol. [preamble].

[24] Ibid., Article 1(b).

[25] Congress in the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Act of 1978 (P.L. 95-242), amended sec. 123 of the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended to direct the President to renegotiate existing U.S. agreements for nuclear cooperation to include nine specific new requirements. Requirement (3) would commit U.S. nuclear trading partners not to use U.S. nuclear aid for a nuclear explosive or any other military purpose, as follows:

(3) . . . a guaranty by the cooperating party that no nuclear materials and equipment or sensitive nuclear technology to be transferred pursuant to such agreement, and no special nuclear material produced through the use of any nuclear materials and equipment or sensitive nuclear technology transferred pursuant to such agreement, will be used for any nuclear explosive device, or for research on or development of any nuclear explosive device, or for any other military purpose.

Reinforced by this provision, U.S. policy requires other states to agree that U.S. supplied items will not be used for weapons or military purposes, thereby separating them from such uses.

[26] Final declaration. NPT/CONF.III/64/1, Annex I, p. 3.

[27] The type of nuclear power plant used by India—the heavy water moderated, natural uranium reactor—is especially well suited to produce weapons quality plutonium while generating electricity, and several of these Indian power plants are not under IAEA safeguards to verify that materials they produce are used only for peaceful purposes.

[28] Under its agreement, the United States provides the Agency with a list of eligible facilities, i.e. all U.S. nuclear facilities except those with direct national security significance. The Agency from time to time can identify on that list certain facilities to be subject to full application of safeguards, and may also designate facilities which it will not inspect, but for which inventory and design information must be submitted. Eventually from 12 to 15 facilities may be subject to safeguards inspection at any one time, with the actual number representing a balance between the political objectives of the Agreement and the cost of applying safeguards. [Letter of submittal of the agreement by the Secretary of State to the President, in Agreement with the International Atomic Energy Agency for the Application of Safeguards in the United States of America, with Protocol. Message from the President of the United States, Feb. 9, 1978, Senate Doc. Exec. B, p. vi]

[29] For example, the U.S.-Australian agreement of 1979 (House Doc. 96-169), deals with safeguards in article 1 and with explosive and military applications in article 8. Article 1.3 provides as follows: "Cooperation under this agreement shall require the application of safeguards by the Agency . . . within the territory of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of an agreement between the United States and the Agency for the application of safeguards in the United States." [H. Doc. 96-169, p. 3]

Article 8, No Explosive or Military Application, provides as follows: "Material, equipment or components transferred pursuant to this agreement to, and which are under the jurisdiction of, a party and material used in or produced through the use of any such material, equipment or components so transferred, which are under the jurisdiction of a party, shall not be used for any nuclear explosive device, for research on or development of any nuclear explosive device, or for any military purpose." [H. Doc. 96-169, p. 14] difficult because the commercial fuel fabricators do not shut down and clean out their production lines after every order. Suspicions that Australian or Canadian uranium imported for civil purposes might inadvertently get into WNP-1 fuel and be used for weapons production could cause difficulties in U.S. relations with these countries and perhaps weaken their support for U.S. nonproliferation policies. It is plausible, however, that U.S. assurances that, as a matter of policy, no Australian or Canadian uranium will be used in the facility might satisfy these allies.

Potential effect on U.S. support for the NPT

Background

As noted earlier, support for the NPT is central U.S. nonproliferation policy.[30] The Bush Administration already is preparing for U.S. participation in next year's NPT review conference where it hopes to obtain a strong concluding statement supportive of the treaty. Such support came out of the 1985 conference, but not so for the 1975 and 1980 conferences which saw much discord over the slow pace of superpower nuclear arms control talks.

Analysis

The next NPT review conference will be in 1990 in Geneva. Then in 1995 a conference will be held to vote on extension of the treaty. So strong international support for the NPT and its extension will be important for U.S. interests.[31]

As noted earlier, choice of the WNP-1 option could generate fresh criticism of U.S. non-proliferation policy as imposing upon non-weapons states obligations the United States is unwilling to accept for itself. In this case, some states might charge the United States with evasion of the principle of separation of civil and military uses of nuclear energy. Also, in 1990 and 1995, it would be prudent to expect that some states would recall that the 1985 review conference in its final document supported separation of civil and military nuclear facilities in nuclear weapons states.

Any estimate of the potential effects of the WNP-1 option on the 1990 NPT review conference and the 1995 extension conference is necessarily subjective and conjectural because so much will depend upon the world situations at those times.

In the best case, criticism of the WNP-1 option would be muted and would soon die down so that by 1995 there would be little, if any, remaining effect. This would be most likely if the United States and the Soviet Union were to agree upon substantial cuts in nuclear arms before 1995, and if certain states of the Middle East are unable to have Israel suspended from the IAEA. In the worst case, if superpower arms control negotiations should stagnate and many nonweapons NPT states become impatient with the delay, or if the United States were to walk out of the IAEA because of some limitation on Israel's participation, then some of these states might pick up the WNP-1 issues as a club with which to belabor the United States. This could further weaken the prospects for the consensus needed to assure extension of the NPT in 1995 on terms favorable to U.S. interests. A closely divided, controversial vote to extend the treaty might well weaken its future support and reduce its attractiveness to the hold-out states.

In either case, it is to be hoped that many, if not most, states are likely to conclude that a world with the NPT is preferable to one without it and so would be careful not to jeopardize its future. But there remains the possibility of miscalculations over this issue which might unintentionally damage the treaty.

CONCLUDING COMMENT

To produce nuclear weapons materials with a nuclear power plant, the WNP-1 unit, originally intended for peaceful use to produce tritium and or plutonium for nuclear weapons probably would be regarded by many within the United States and abroad as chipping away at the carefully erected wall between civil and military uses of nuclear energy and blurring the distinction between civil and weapons applications of nuclear energy. It could also provide an undesirable example of conversion of a civil nuclear power plant to the production of nuclear weapons materials; perhaps open a loophole in the nuclear verification system of the International Atomic Energy Agency (safeguards); cause Australia and Canada to question whether uranium they have previously supplied to the United States might in some way be used to produce nuclear weapons materials; and perhaps weaken the ability of the United States to secure a favorable extension of the Treaty on Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons in 1995.

While the WNP-1 option does not appear to violate the letter of any U.S. treaty commitment or the Atomic Energy Act of 1954 as amended, it could be seen as contrary to the conditions that the United States has imposed on many other states through its agreements for nuclear cooperation. On the other hand, advocates of the WNP-1 option are likely to point out that the unit never has been operated for civil applications, that it is located on a DOE reservation, that change in its planned use would be done openly, and that measures could be undertaken to mitigate adverse preceptions.

That the potential of the WNP-1 option could work to the disadvantage of U.S. policies to prevent the further spread, or proliferation of nuclear weapons is undeniable. However, their impacts cannot now be predicted with any certainty. The potential effects are likely to depend upon future circumstances, particularly the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union and the state of their nuclear arms reduction negotiations. If tensions between the two superpowers are low and they agree upon substantial nuclear arms reduction, then choosing the WNP-1 option probably would have little effect. On the other hand, if Soviet-American relations worsen and nuclear arms reduction negotiations stalemate, then nonweapons states and various public interest groups at home and abroad could be expected to be critical of the WNP-1 option. If so, U.S. influence over future directions for world non-proliferation policy might be weakened, which could make it more difficult for the United States to achieve its long standing goal of preventing the further spread of nuclear weapons and the ability to make them.

[30] More recently, at a hearing before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs on May 18, 1989, Reginald Bartholomew, Under Secretary of State for Security Assistance, Science and Technology, said that the United States must increase the number of adherents to the NPT and work toward a successful Review Conference in 1990 and 1995. Ambassador Ronald F. Lehman II, ACDA Director, also spoke of the NPT and said: "The U.S. must reinforce and reinvigorate both the NPT and the Treaty of Tlatelolco . . . We are working now to assure a successful outcome of the 1990 NPT Review Conference . . ."

[31] Article X-2 of the NPT provides as follows: "Twenty-five years after the entry into force of the Treaty [i.e. March 3, 1995] a conference shall be convened to decide whether the Treaty shall continue in force indefinitely, or shall be extended for an additional fixed period or periods. This decision shall be taken by a majority of the parties to the Treaty.

GORE-McCAIN MISSILE AND PROLIFERATION CONTROL ACT

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, earlier this week, Senator McCAIN and I engaged in a colloquy with Senators NUNN, WARNER, BINGAMAN, PELL, and HELMS, on the subject of the Gore-McCain Missile and Proliferation Control Act, S. 1421. Members may recall that a counterpart of our bill had just been overwhelmingly passed in the House of Representatives as an amendment to the Defense authorization bill there. To protect our position, Senator McCAIN and I then converted our free-standing bill into an amendment to the Senate version of the Defense authorization bill, and the colloquy to which I referred was on the subject of what we were going to do about jurisdiction.

At any rate, we agreed to shift our bill to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, with assurances from Senator PELL that it will receive early consideration there, in the fall. We were also encouraged by Senator NUNN's personal commitment to seek incorporation of certain basic principles relating to the problem of ballistic missile proliferation, into the conference report on the defense bill, assuming that Congressman BERMAN would agree to deferral of the consideration of specifics. Those principles comprised:

The reality and significance of the problem and its expanding nature.

The need for the United States to aggressively expand the membership to include the Soviet Union and, at an appropriate time, the People's Republic of China—and clarify the terms of the MTCR.

The need for measures to improve the U.S. licensing process.

The need for sanctions against domestic firms or persons and foreign states, firms, entities, and/or persons found to be evading or violating MTCR guidelines.

The need for an expanded flow of information from the executive branch to the Congress on this problem.

The need to put specifics into place rapidly.

Members and others who wish to read this exchange in detail will find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 2, 1989, beginning on page S9485. In any event, however, with permission, I would like to Include a copy of the exchange for reproduction in the RECORD along with my remarks today and those of Senator McCAIN, who also intends to make some comments.

Mr. President, in the days since we announced our bill, Senator MCCAIN and I have had a number of inquiries from businesses, business associations, and embassies— expressing concern that the bill would restrain trade or extend some concept of extraterritoriality. I'd like to address these concerns here in order to deal as clearly as possible with them.

S. 1421 aims to restrain and inhibit only a form of trade already declared off limits by the governments adhering to the missile control technology regime [MTCR]. No product or service not already contemplated by the MTCR is contemplated by S. 1421. All we aim to do is to give the President some very effective tools to use in support of the existing policy.

As regards the question of extraterritoriality, let me refer those who are concerned to section 3(d), "Inapplicability to Foreign Persons License by an MTCR Country." What this section says in plain English is that if an MTCR government issues a license to one of its corporations, and the license is based on honest information, then— no matter how much the United States Government may disagree with the judgement call made by the MTCR government—we live with it: the sanctions proposed in S. 1421 do not apply.

Mr. President, the proliferation of ballistic missiles is a serious threat to international order. Senator MCCAIN, Congressman BERMAN and I have worked hard to develop an approach that is well thought out. We ask all concerned to study the language of this bill carefully, and we wish them to get in touch with our offices in order to ask questions and register their views.

Mr. President, I ask that the earlier colloquy be reprinted.

There being no objection, the colloquy was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. President, I would like to join Senator GORE in his comments on the impact of our bill on U.S. exports. Anyone who reads it carefully will immediately understand that rather than hurt U.S. exports, it will help prevent a case where U.S. manufacturers are forced out of a market by the willingness of other states to export goods and services that U.S. manufacturers cannot sell.

Our bill closes a critical gap in the present MTCR regime. It applies sanctions to states that are not members of the MTCR, and it makes it clear that the United States will not accept a situation where another MTCR agreement exploits the flexibility in this agreement to sell equipment and technology the United States cannot. It sends a clear message to Western Europe, the PRC, Argentina, and a host of other states that they cannot profit in areas where United States firms cannot sell.

Mr. President, we need to be realistic. No U.S. firm will ever get profits from exports to countries who use those exports to deliver weapons of mass destruction, or the means to deliver them, that will be worth the cost. Even if legal sanctions do not come into play, public opinion will.

The practical problem is to bring similar pressure to bear on the foreign sellers and buyers of such technology. This not only is essential to fight proliferation, it is essential to ensure that no nation can casually profit from allowing its firms or export entities to become "merchants of mass destruction."

MISSILE PROLIFERATION

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the transfer to third countries around the world of ballistic missiles capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction and of the technology needed to produce such missiles is an assault on world security. Recognizing this, in 1987, the United States joined with six other nations—Canada, Japan, France, the United Kingdom, Italy, and the Federal Republic of Germany—to establish the Missile Technology Control Regime [MTCR], which aims to prevent such transfers.

The creation of the MTCR was an important step forward. Nevertheless, transfers continue, and it is clear that some tough punitive measures are needed to give bite to the nontransfer policy. Last week, Senator MCCAIN and I introduced legislation, S. 1421, designed to meet the need: The Gore-McCain Missile and Proliferation Control Act. A parallel measure has already been introduced in the House by Congressman HOWARD BERMAN.

In taking this step, we gave credit to Senator BINGAMAN, whose hearings on this issue in the Defense Industry and Technology Subcommittee underscore the need for legislation, and who has already introduced a bill of his own on this subject, that would help block proliferation by expanding the scope and impact of the MTCR.

The Gore-McCain bill strengthens and builds on the Missile Technology Control Regime [MTCR]. It would impose sanctions on companies and nations that engage in the trade or development of long-range missile systems capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction. S. 1421 also recognizes that destabilizing offensive aircraft are capable of delivering such weapons and their development should be monitored closely as part of a comprehensive proliferation control regime.

Mr. President, I would yield to my colleague and cosponsor, Senator MCCAIN, to provide further details about our bill.

Mr. MCCAIN. I thank the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, S. 1421 reflects our belief that it should be the policy of the United States to take appropriate measures to discourage the proliferation of the technology, materials, and weapons necessary to produce missiles and deliver weapons of mass destruction. The United States should monitor closely the development, transfer, sale, and so forth, of such items, including destabilizing offensive aircraft. The bill would prohibit the flow of U.S. technology that would assist a nation in developing such weaponry. In addition, the United States should discourage Communist bloc countries and companies in non-Communist countries from aiding and abetting others in acquiring the relevant technology and materials.

With regard to enforcement, our bill provides that the President will determine if a U.S. person is engaged in the trade, conspiring to trade, or facilitating the trade of an MTCR item in violation of U.S. law, or, in the case of a foreign person, if an export license for the trade of that item would be denied under U.S. law. The President will also determine if a less developed state or entity is importing MTCR items or long-range systems or is equipping its forces with new or additional missile systems capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction.

If a violation by a U.S. person is discovered, the President shall choose to deny that person export licenses and/or prohibit contracting with or procurement from the U.S. Government. If a violation by a foreign person is found, the President may impose the same sanctions and also prohibit the import into the United States of products or services of the foreign person. Further, if the President determines that a non-MTCR country is developing or deploying missile systems capable of delivering weapons of mass destruction, the President may deny or reduce technical assistance, deny transfer of all or selected items of technology under the control of the U.S. Government and prohibit the importation into the United States of all or selected items of technology.

The President may choose to waive sanctions if the product or service is essential to the national security of the United States, the person in violation is the sole source supplier of the product or service, or the end-user of the product is the U.S. Government.

These economic sanctions are important, but we have learned in recent months that the public exposure of given seller firms and countries, and of efforts to develop a capacity to deliver weapons of mass destruction in less developed countries, may well be the most effective way of blocking such efforts.

Under the bill, the administration is required to detail and assess the efforts of all foreign countries to acquire and produce long-range missile systems and destabilizing offensive aircraft, and the efforts of Communist countries to aid or abet other nations in their efforts. Similar information is required on all companies that have or continue to provide such assistance to foreign countries. Such information in a report, however, is not required if it would jeopardize the national security of the United States or compromise sensitive intelligence operations.

Finally, the Gore-McCain bill recognizes that we need to take decisive action this year. The problem we are dealing with may be one that takes decades to trigger a major global crisis, but the legacy of the Iraq-Iran war and the other recent regional crises is already driving country after country to at least examine its options for proliferation of both weapons of mass destruction, and the means of delivering them. We cannot deal with the next problem in arms control with a business as usual approach, or by creating compromises of convenience that deprive our efforts at fighting proliferation of their teeth.

President Bush and Secretary Baker have already recognized this urgency, but much of the bureaucracy has not. At present, there is an unfortunate tendency within the bureaucracy to obstruct and delay, to propose ineffective or symbolic action, and to find problems rather than solutions. Hopefully, our introduction of this bill will help to remind that bureaucracy that it works for the President, and exists to implement his policy priorities. At a minimum, I believe it will build upon the work already done by other Members of this body, and by Congressman BERMAN and others in the House of Representatives, to ensure we create a solid body of legislation this year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it had been the intention of the distinguished Senator from Arizona and me to propose S. 1421 as an amendment to S. 1352, the defense authorization act for fiscal years 1990 and 1991, particularly since our counterpart bill in the House was added to their version of the defense authorization bill by an overwhelming vote of 417-9. However, we recognize that at the request of the chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Senator NUNN, Senator BINGAMAN agreed in markup not to propose his missile proliferation bill, S. 1227, as an amendment to the Defense authorization bill. I would inquire of the Senator from New Mexico whether my understanding is correct.

Mr. BINGAMAN. The Senator from Tennessee is absolutely correct. I, too, am deeply concerned about the grave threat represented by ballistic and cruise missile proliferation. In the short term the problem is ballistic missiles, but by the turn of the century cruise missile proliferation will pose a growing threat if not checked. On June 22, I introduced S. 1227, the Missile Control Act of 1989, and I am pleased to have Senators GORE and MCCAIN as cosponsors, along with Senators MITCHELL, NUNN, GLENN, PELL, BRADLEY, DECONCINI, LIEBERMAN, CONRAD, LUGAR, KENNEDY, BOREN, DURENBERGER, BIDEN, KERRY, MATSUNAGA, DODD, and WIRTH.

S. 1227 provides a comprehensive strategy for restricting the transfer of ballistic and cruise missiles and related technology. If passed, it will encourage the United States to take the lead in restricting the development and transfer of intermediate range ballistic and cruise missiles and related technology. If passed, in combination with legislation to control nuclear, chemical, and biological weapons, it will restore to the United States the mantle of leadership toward a safer world.

This legislation is perhaps more modest in scope than S. 1421, but it does what is needed. It improves export controls and enforcement; it takes a global approach to enforcement which will not disadvantage American industry. It provides sanctions calibrated to the degree of violation, which are sufficiently strict to discourage countries and companies from cheating by denying American missile equipment and technology.

Our bill encourages the United States to take the lead in seeking international cooperation in restricting the transfer of ballistic and cruise missiles and related technologies. It reenforces U.S. adherence to the Missile Technology Control Regime [MTCR] by encouraging the administration to seek a common and stricter interpretation of MTCR provisions and more adherents to the MTCR.

It mandates cooperation among the executive agencies responsible for missile control, but it does not add layers of bureaucracy or slow the process for review of export licenses.

Mr. President, nonproliferation of missiles is not a partisan issue. Rather it is an issue of the gravest concern to every one of us. The decision before Congress is not whether we should pass legislation to prevent missile proliferation, but what type of legislation will best ensure the effective implementation of a missile nonproliferation policy.

A related question is which bill is the appropriate vehicle for legislation on this issue. As the Senator from Tennessee noted, I had originally considered attaching S. 1227 to the Defense authorization bill, but I withheld that amendment in mark up at Senator NUNN's request. Senator NUNN felt strongly that since the Foreign Relations Committee has jurisdiction over changes to the Arms Export Control Act, legislation on the missile proliferation issue should be handled by that committee. That having been said, I would have to say with all respect for my chairman that were the Gore-McCain Missile and Proliferation Control Act to be offered as an amendment to this bill, I would have to reserve my prerogative to offer S. 1227 as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. President, I would, therefore, ask the distinguished Senator from Georgia for his assessment of the situation we face.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of Senator GORE, Senator MCCAIN, and Senator BINGAMAN and commend them for the leadership they are demonstrating in the Senate on this critical issue of missile proliferation.

I do believe, however, that the Defense authorization bill is not the vehicle for legislation on this issue and I regret that the House has seen fit to put a major piece of legislation on this subject on the Defense authorization bill it passed last week.

I would hope that Senator GORE and Senator MCCAIN would refrain from offering their bill as an amendment to the Defense authorization bill and that Senator BINGAMAN would exercise similar restraint. Both bills could then follow the regular procedure of being carefully considered and marked up by the Foreign Relations Committee. I recognize that the Senators would want some assurance that the Foreign Relations Committee would act on their bills, and I would, therefore, ask the chairman and ranking member of that committee if they might advise us of their plans for dealing with this issue.

Mr. PELL. Mr. President, I appreciate Senator NUNN's consideration of the Foreign Relations Committee's jurisdiction in this area. I intend that the Committee on Foreign Relations mark up in early September legislation dealing primarily with the chemical weapons problem. I have introduced legislation, S. 195, which imposes sanctions for the use of chemical and biological weapons. I expect that this legislation will address the problem of missile proliferation. My colleague, the Senator from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, has a bill, S. 238, proposing sanctions against commerce in chemicals for weapons. In addition, I would expect to have a hearing in September on specific ways to control missile proliferation and would expect to consider the bills under discussion today at that hearing and in a mark up soon thereafter.

I would ask the distinguished ranking member, Senator HELMS, whether he concurs.

Mr. HELMS. I agree with the comments by the chairman of our committee, Senator PELL. Ballistic missile proliferation is a critical issue confronting this Nation, and it is very high on my legislative agenda. Earlier this year, I introduced a bill, S. 208, to inhibit the proliferation of ballistic and cruise missiles in the Middle East. That bill has been referred to our committee, and it will be considered when we address this issue this fall.

Mr. President, I might also mention that I see no necessity for the Foreign Relations Committee to report out one omnibus bill dealing with the proliferation issue. It may well be that it makes more sense to report out a package of related but separate bills addressing, respectively, the chemical, nuclear, and ballistic and cruise missile dimensions of the overall proliferation problem.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the chairman and ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee. Based on those assurances, I am prepared to join with Senator MCCAIN and Senator BINGAMAN in withholding any amendment to this bill on this subject. I would ask, however, the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Virginia, Senator WARNER, how they would propose to handle this issue in conference, given that the House bill does include the amendment by Mr. BERMAN which is very similar to the Gore-McCain Missile and Proliferation Control Act.

Mr. NUNN. I would say to my friend from Tennessee that it would be my intent to persuade the House conferees to recede to the Senate and drop the Berman amendment without prejudice to its merits. That, then, would afford the House Foreign Affairs Committee an opportunity to consider that legislation in the regular manner, leading eventually to a House-Senate conference by members of the two foreign affairs committees on legislation related to proliferation problems. I would ask Senator WARNER if he would concur in that approach.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I fully agree with the statement of Senator NUNN as to how the Senate conferees would approach this matter in conference. I might add that I hope both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the House Foreign Affairs Committee will work with the administration to ensure that any amendments reported out of these committees have the input of those departments that will be affected by such legislation.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the comments of the chairman and ranking member of our committee. I am pleased to hear that in seeking to have the Berman amendment omitted from the conference report you would do so without prejudice to its merits. I wonder if you might also indicate that you agree with Senators MCCAIN and BINGAMAN and me that if the House conferees agree to drop the Berman amendment, the conference report should reflect the view of the conferees that the Congress should attach high priority to enacting legislation this session addressing the ballistic missile proliferation threat. I would further inquire whether the Senators would agree that that report should indicate the agreement of the conferees on certain broad principles which they believe legislation on this issue should reflect, and which are reflected in both S. 1421 and S. 1227, including:

The reality and significance of the problem and its expanding nature;

The need for the United States to aggressively expand the membership—to include the Soviet Union and, at an appropriate time, the People's Republic of China—and clarify the terms of the MTCR;

The need for measures to improve the U.S. licensing process;

The need for sanctions against domestic firms or persons and foreign states, firms, entities, and/or persons found to be evading or violating MTCR guidelines;

The need for an expanded flow of information from the executive branch to the Congress on this problem; and

The need to put specifics in place rapidly.

Mr. NUNN. I, of course, cannot commit the House conferees to any language in advance of the conference; nor could I presume to guarantee at this stage what language the Senate conferees would accept. However, I can assure you, as well as Senator MCCAIN and Senator BINGAMAN, that I personally agree with your statement of principles and will work in conference to have it reflected in the conference report should the House consent to recede to the Senate on this issue.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, I concur in the remarks of Senator NUNN. I might add, as well, that I would hope that the language in the conference report will also commend the administration for its good faith efforts to implement the intent of the MTCR while, as noted by Senator GORE, recognizing the need for additional measures to further improve the U.S. licensing process.

Mr. GORE. I thank the Senators for their cooperation on this matter.

RECORD CORRECTION AMENDMENT 613

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate a printing error on page S9216 of the RECORD for August 1, 1989, with respect to amendment No. 613. The amendment as filed and adopted read as follows:

On page 11, line 5, strike "Chairman and ranking minority members of the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives shall each appoint one member" and insert "the Majority Leader and the Minority Leader of the Senate shall jointly appoint two members, and the Speaker and the Minority Leader of the House of Representatives shall jointly appoint two members."

On page 12, line 5, strike "the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and the House of Representatives," and insert "Congress.".

On page 12, line 22, strike "while minimizing interference" and insert "consistent".

On page 14, between lines 3 and 4, insert the following: (9) The adequacy of the five-year plan proposed by the Secretary of Energy to bring the Department of Energy atomic energy defense facilities into compliance with environmental laws.

NATIONAL CENTER FOR MANUFACTURING SCIENCES

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I would like to clarify the intent of langauge found in the committee report on S. 1352 that relates to a major cooperative research initiative known as the National Center for Manufacturing Sciences.

Mr. President, the National Center for Manufacturing Sciences [NCMS] was formed as a result of the President's 1986 domestic action plan to revive and support U.S. manufacturing technology industries. The NCMS has grown to become the largest R&D consortium in the United States in terms of member companies and industry coverage.

The NCMS participates in numerous DOD manufacturing programs of strategic importance to the defense industrial base. NCMS projects complement and supplement defense projects in advanced machines tool controls, computer-aided logistics, concurrent engineering, technology transfer, electronic data interchange, flexible manufacturing systems, and advanced materials.

Mr. President, over the past 2 years the NCMS has shown that they are able to extend the reach of taxpayer dollars by matching Government funds with industry resources. This effective leveraging of scare Government resources should be encouraged whenever possible.

In fiscal years 1988 and 1989, the Department of Defense supported the startup operations of the NCMS with a $5 million grant each year from the Air Force Manufacturing Technology [MANTECH] Program. The Defense Industry and Technology Subcommittee has again authorized $5 million for the NCMS for fiscal year 1990.

Mr. President, the NCMS has progressed quickly since its formation in 1986. It has identified major needs and planned long-term programs of strategic importance to the industrial base that individual U.S. firms are unable to fund independently. The NCMS is orgainizationally prepared to launch high priority programs pending an increased financial commitment from the Department of Defense for fiscal year 1990.

I would like to clarify with my colleagues, Senator BINGAMAN, the chairman of the Defense Industry and Technology Subcommittee, as to whether or not the Department of Defense is being limited by this authorization bill to grant no more than $5 million to the NCMS for its programs in fiscal year 1990. I think that it would be a mistake for the Congress to do so considering the opportunities that the NCMS provides to leverage Government technology base programs.

Mr. BINGAMAN. Mr. President, the Defense Industry and Technology Subcommittee has strongly supported the establishment of the National Center for Manufacturing Sciences. I understand my good friend Senator LEVIN's concern for defense manufacturing technology programs since they directly impact the quality and productivity of defense weapon system procurements.

S. 1352 includes a $60 million increase over the administration request for manufacturing technology programs for all services and agencies. The NCMS has the serious and long-term task of revitalizing our manufacturing technology industries. The level, span and scope of the research programs that must be undertaken by the NCMS demands cooperation between industry and Government.

Thus, S. 1352 mandates a $5 million grant to the NCMS in fiscal year 1990, but in no way does it limit any of the services or agencies from providing additional funding via either contracts or grants to the NCMS if they deem it to further the goals of their manufacturing technology programs, provided that these funds are authorized and appropriated for this purpose.

ANTISATELLITE WEAPON TEST BAN

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, control over the high ground is not exactly a new concept in military thinking. The imperative of seizing the high ground, for surveillance or attack, has been around since about the time of the Trojan War, or maybe earlier.

Of course, the definition of what constitutes the high ground has changed, from hilltops and trees to the observation balloons of the French revolutionary wars. From the primitive reconnaissance planes of World War One to the U-2, the SR-71, and the satellite.

The Soviets are ahead of us in applying this ancient concept to the use of space. We use space for military surveillance and communications. But the Soviets have gone a lot further than we have in thinking through the concepts of space and space control. It is not enough to capture the high ground. You have to be able to hold it. Or at least, keep the enemy from holding it.

So it is unfortunate that the arms control lobby, and some of my colleagues here in this body, have decided to cede control of space to the Soviet Union. That would be the effect of an amendment to ban U.S. Asat testing, that was intended to have been offered to the defense authorization bill, but was ruled nongermane. I suspect that we will see this amendment again, possibly on the defense appropriation bill.

For this body to adopt such legislation would be wrong, irresponsible, and in a war, it would be completely devastating both in space, and in the land and sea battle. If the Soviets can use space with impunity to target our ground forces in Europe, and the naval forces we rely on to bring over reinforcements and supplies, then we will surely lose the war. Likewise, if the Soviets are able to deny us the use of space to support our operations in Europe, we will be unable to carry out the deep-strike attacks we would rely on to defeat a Soviet attack. A future land battle in Europe would be won or lost in space.

What do the Soviets have to say on the use of space during wartime? According to the Soviet military dictionary, their goals in space are to "deny the use of space to other States, and to assure maximum space-based military support for Soviet * * * combat operations on land, at sea, in air, and in outer space."

That seems pretty clear to me. The Soviets want to use space to support attacks on enemy ground, naval, and air assets, and deny the enemy the use of space to target Soviet forces. And they have put their money where their doctrine is. The Soviets continue to maintain an operational coorbital Asat, in a constant state of readiness. They maintain ABM and electronic warfare systems with Asat capabilities. They have lasers with Asat potential.

Now I know all the arguments about the Soviet Asat: "It's primitive, it has a relatively low probability of kill, and it hasn't been tested since 1982." Therefore, we are told, it does not pose a threat.

Well here are the facts. The Soviet coorbital Asat is primitive the same way a baseball bat is primitive. If you are in a fight, and the other guy has a baseball bat and you do not, it does not matter how primitive that baseball bat is.

As for the test results, without getting into classified material, let us just say that if you take the number of Asat's in their inventory, divide that by the observed PK, and apply that to the number of high-value satellites we have in low-altitude orbit, and we have a very serious problem.

And then there is the old testing bugaboo. True, the Soviets have not conducted an end-to-end test of their coorbital Asat since 1982. But they routinely test the components, including the launch vehicle, tracking radars, and on-orbit command techniques. And they maintain their Asat fleet in a constant state of readiness. For what? May Day fireworks? The Fourth of July?

As for the Soviet laser at Sary Shagan, which the sponsors of this amendment ridicule, suffice it to say that the National Resources Defense Council delegation was looking at the wrong laser. The system they saw is, indeed, obsolete. But it was not the laser the Defense Department has identified as having some antisatellite capability. That laser is several miles away, and the NRDC delegation apparently didn't get anywhere near it.

Those are arguments about the facts. But what about the underlying premise, which seems to be this: Since the United States is supposedly more dependent on space-based assets, we supposedly have more to lose than the Soviets, so we shouldn't develop an Asat because that will cause the Soviets to develop even more Asat's and we will be the net loser. Development of a U.S. Asat, we are told, would be destabilizing.

But what is destabilizing, I would tell my colleagues, is the current state of affairs, where the Soviets have an Asat and we don't! For the life of me, I can't see why our satellites are safer, why we are somehow better off, if the Soviets have an Asat and we don't. We lose both ways. Since there's nothing to deter an attack on U.S. satellites, we jeopardize our own ability to use space in support of our military operations. And we give the Soviets a sanctuary from which they can target our terrestrial forces with impunity. What's so stabilizing about that?

Of course, just like any other aspect of warfare, there would be some difficult decisions to be made about the conduct of operations in space. Asat opponents say you can't have an Asat for deterrence and for warfighting too. That's baloney. Why do we have nuclear weapons? Why do we have any weapons? To deter aggression, but if deterrence fails, to win. There's no contradiction there. It could be that in wartime the United States would elect not to use its Asat against Soviet satellites because we felt the long-term exchange ratio would be unfavorable. But that would be our choice. Supporters of a ban on United States Asat testing want to place the fate of our satellites, and to a great extent our ground and naval forces, in Soviet hands.

As I said earlier, the Soviets have thought this issue through. As the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Admiral Crowe, told the Defense Appropriations Subcommittee:

> The Soviets * * * have prepared themselves and are ready, especially with the coorbital interceptor, to fight and fight successfully. We have nothing approaching that capability—thus the need for a U.S. Asat capability is essential.

Admiral Crowe concludes:

We cannot relinquish control of space to an adversary whose intent is clear.

Mr. President, I would urge my colleagues to bear Admiral Crowe's words in mind in future debates on the Asat issue.

Mr. KERRY. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Idaho raised questions about those who would restrain antisatellite weaponary and antisatellite technology. And he pointed to the threat that the Soviet Union poses to the United States in this field. He said that we should not give to the Soviet Union the ability to decide for us what we want to do in space or how we should proceed with our programs.

That makes sense. I agree with that, Mr. President. We should not give to the Soviet Union ever any veto power over any choices that we make about weapons systems that we need to further the security interests of the United States.

But as is often the case in debates about weapon systems, we hear arguments made that really do not apply to the situation that is at hand. No one is suggesting, and no one that I know of has ever suggested, that those who oppose antisatellite firings and testing, are somehow proposing to give to another country any veto power or are not interested in the best security interests of the United States. And to understand that, you have to look at the state of satellite technology and look at what our own satellites mean to us in terms of our security.

This is not the time to debate in full antisatellite weaponry, and I am not going to do that. But I want the record at this point to show that there are some important choices that the United States ought to be making regarding our security and the future of weapons in space, choices that we simply have not been willing to make. Countless times in the arms race, we have rushed headlong to create a new weapon system, without adequately thinking out what the repercussions are of the creation of that weapon system. Throughout the entire history of the arms race, going back to the first atomic bomb's explosion, one can trace an effort by the United States or the Soviet Union to create a system and a similar effort by the other country, to catch up to the country that created the system. We blew up the atom bomb; a few years later, they blew up an atom bomb. We blew up a hydrogen bomb; a year later, they blew up the hydrogen bomb. We put bombs on airplanes thinking that would strengthen our security. A few years later, they put them on airplanes. Then we went into submarines. Then we went into satellites in 1957 with the Soviets putting Sputnik up, which was, in fact, the first real technological lead that the Soviet Union ever achieved, in the course of the arms race, ahead of us.

We followed with the first antiballistic missile. We then decided, would it not be a wonderful idea if we put a lot of warheads on one missile, so we did multiple independent targetable reentry vehicles. Lo and behold, the Soviets countered, and they put bigger warheads on bigger missiles, and we suddenly found that what we called the window of vulnerability was turned on us. They had bigger missiles with bigger capacity, and we were in fact outfoxed by our own creation of that system. Then there were cruise missiles and so forth.

Well, Mr. President, the same thing is about to happen in space. To the best of our knowledge, as we are here today on a lovely summer's day, as Congress is about to go home for recess, there is no evidence that anybody has weapons in space. And we depend on our satellites for verification, for command and control, and our satellites are much more important to our system, frankly, than the Soviets in terms of security.

So the question ought to be asked by logical, reasonable people: Is it in the best security interests of the United States of America to repeat the same syndrome that has led us to where we are, by rushing headlong into the creation of a whole new technology for satellites, killing each other in space, without even knowning where we are going with it? Will we then get into a whole new technology of satellites protecting each other against the kill, hardening satellites? How much is it going to cost? Are we going to have to improve launch capacity, more rapid launch and so forth?

Now, Mr. President, there is no naivete in anyone's approach to this process. The Soviets have a very rudimentary antisatellite system. It is fired off a liquid-fuel rocket. It goes up into space.

It has to circle the Earth once before it links up to its target. Then it links up to its target, and it explodes beside its target. It takes about 6 hours before the next rocket can be put up into space.

Now, in those intervening 6 hours, the United States, should this happen, has countless remedies available to it. More important, the Soviet Union decided 7 years ago that they thought it was important to restrain this technology.

So, Mr. President, they unilaterally stopped testing. The Soviet Union stopped testing 7 years ago, and five of the last six tests were failures before that. So this is not a system in which they can have confidence, Mr. President. For the last 3 years we have ageed with their moratorium, and we have not tested against an object in space. That is the key here—a firing against an object in space.

Now, I say to the Senator from Idaho, all that the proponents of restraint are proposing today is not to restrain research, we can continue research; not to restrain development, we can continue development; but simply to restrain a test against an object in space, so long as the Soviet Union also does it. It is not unilateral. It is mutual. It is not letting them decide what we did. It is deciding what is in the best interests for both of us in terms of our futures.

But in addition to that, we are saying that the Soviet Union, if we are going to do this, has to open up its laser sites for our inspection and monitoring, and must also enter into negotiations with the United States in good faith for antisatellite restraint.

Now, Mr. President, what could be more sensible than setting up an equation where we will not test against an object in space, if they will not test against an object in space, if it means that we could inspect their laser sites and high technology sites and have onsite verification developed to a greater degree, which permits the United States to accomplish the very goal of our START talks and INF?

In the INF, for the first time, we agreed to have onsite inspection, and we began a whole new regime in terms of arms control. I respectfully suggest that this should be looked on as an opportunity to try to gain control over the absurdity and craziness of the spiraling arms race which takes us from one weapon system to another, more sophisticated than another.

We have cruise missiles we cannot even verify today. We have enormous problems of verification. It is interesting to note, Mr. President, that the President's own National Security Adviser, Mr. Brent Scowcroft, recently wrote an article for the Aspin study group, and he said, "We find it hard to identify a set of circumstances in which the benefits of using the limited existing ASAT systems markedly outweigh the potential risks.

All scenarios involving the use of Asat, especially those surrounding crises, increase the risks of accident, misperception, and inadvertent escalation.

He went on to write that at high levels of tension, attacks on satellites can be interpreted as signal of an impending nuclear strike, and for this reason alone, a move of this sort would be foolhardy.

I am not going to go on, Mr. President, at great length. I said I would not. I think it is important not to look at every single restraint on the building of a weapon system as somehow a restraint on the capacity of this country to defend itself or to stand up for its security.

Why can we not begin to think of the national security of the United States and of the world in terms of restraining a weapons system rather than building it?

There is that old saying of Will Rogers that he never met a man he did not like. Regrettably, there are too many people in the U.S. Congress who never met a weapons system they did not like.

The question is whether or not for the first time we could take advantage of what now the President and Secretary Gorbachev are trying to do by opening up facilities and testing the Soviet Union, not trusting them, testing them, putting them to a rigorous test of their willingness to adhere to our higher standards of verification.

I close by reminding the President that just this month the United States Congressmen and scientists were invited to go to Sary Shagan which is the site of the laser technology that we have often referred to as the critical location of Soviet capacity to injure the United States.

I have the strategic defense initiative booklet, "Progress and Promise" and here, Mr. President, on one of the pages is the directed energy R&D site at Sary Shagan and it shows a laser going up in space and shooting down a satellite.

Mr. President, this is the very site that was visited by these Congressmen and what they found was that contrary to the SDI booklet and other estimates this site does not have the capacity to shoot down a satellite. Contrary to all the hype and hoopla that has justified spending billions of dollars and trying to spend more, they found not a megawattage for a beam generator, but they found an old CO-2 generator which is on the Common Market for purchase, which has a 2 to 20 kilowattage, sort of a large searchlight, and the very best that that could even do is perhaps track satellites, that is observe them by illuminating them.

They found 1960's technology in the hard-wired computer system at Sary Shagan. They did not find modern computer chips.

So, Mr. President, it is clear that at least the Soviet Union invited them there, at least the Soviet Union was willing to open up the possibility of further inspection, and we would be foolhardy not to take advantage of the opportunities now available to respond to try to gain restraint in this particular field.

Mr. President, I will have more to say about this when we return in September and October and take up the appropriations bill and actually debate this on the floor. But I hope that the Congress will think very carefully about this opportunity and about the important tests that it offers in terms of trying to restrain rather than build yet again another system.

I thank the distinguished President pro tempore for his time, and I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The President pro tempore has the floor.

ISRAEL AND TERRORISM

Mr. COATS. Mr. President, Winston Churchill once dispensed some good advice on dealing with allies. He said. "it is no use once again leading other nations up the garden path and then running away when the dog growls."

Over the last 10 years, the most vocal advocates of swift retribution and immediate justice for terrorist murders have come from this body. Each new instance of brutality has been met with one pained and insistent refrain: Locate these terrorists and bring them to justice.

But now one of our closest allies has done something we did not anticipate—they acted on our words. Evidently we have become so accustomed to failure—so content with inertia—that we cannot even recognize success when it stares us in the face. It is Israel that has given reality to our rhetoric. It is Israel that took our advice and captured a terrorist leader—exercising its rights as a sovereign nation, threatened from all sides, to bring its most brutal enemy to justice.

But in the last few days, Arab terrorists have played their bloody trump card. And some in this Nation have insinuated, even declared, that Israel is to blame. The dog has made its rabid growl. And some recommend, once again, that we abandon an ally and beat a hasty and undignified retreat.

But there is no moral equivalence—or even moral relation—between Israel's act of justice and the terrorist's act of shame. We cannot forget that Israel offered the murderers of Colonel Higgens the freedom of their leader in a prisoner exchange. The Hezbollah was presented with a stark decision. But they chose the terrorists's pleasure in lawless murder, even above their own cause.

These are men who have severed their last tenuous ties with common humanity. These are men whose only motivation and pleasure is the destruction of even those who seek to keep the peace.

I am fully and finally convinced that diplomacy will neither moderate their demands nor soften their methods. We can explore with them the whole diplomatic terrain. But down every vista these fanatics see only the gallows.

This week we were shocked by a murder and presented with the prospect of more of the same. Harold MacMillian once said, "I have never attended the funeral of a murdered man; but I take it that at such a ceremony some distinction is made between the mourners and the assassins."

In this case the distinction is as clear as the line between civilization and barbarism. The United States mourns. Israel mourns, and Arab terrorists are left stained by the blood of the innocent. To confuse these groups is to confuse the very nature of justice, and we should not be a party to it.

REAUTHORIZATION OF THE CLEAN AIR ACT

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. President, I rise today to join a number of my colleagues from both sides of the aisle in cosponsoring legislation prepared by President Bush to reauthorize and strengthen the Clean Air Act. I would like to take a few moments to discuss the President's proposal and to acknowledge the very constructive role that I believe this proposal can play in enhancing the likelihood that amendments to the Clean Air Act will become law during this Congress.

My colleagues are certainly aware that the reauthorization of the Clean Air Act has been and continues to be, a contentious and emotional issue. Special interests on both sides of this issue have been strident and uncompromising, leading to a legislative deadlock that has prevented enactment of reasonable and necessary measures to improve air quality and protect public health and environmental quality. Our esteemed majority leader, Senator MITCHELL, has labored for years to move forward reauthorization of this act. He has my respect for his tireless efforts. The chairman of the Subcommittee on Environmental Protection, Senator BAUCUS, is committed to enactment of amendments to strengthen the Clean Air Act, and he is working hard to achieve that goal. And now the President has placed his own proposal on the table, adding great momentum to the reauthorization process.

The legislation sent to us by President Bush is a comprehensive package of amendments intended to deal with the range of air quality issues. The bill includes provisions to address the failure of many of our cities to achieve national air quality standards, to provide a more workable regulatory system to reduce possible health hazards from exposure to toxic air pollutants, and to aggressively reduce pollutants that contribute to acid rain through a flexible and cost efficient program. Overall, I believe the President's proposal to be a solid and constructive contribution to the clean air debate. I applaud his willingness to roll up his sleeves and risk the wrath of those narrow interests who would rather fan the flames for their own benefit than see the Congress enact credible and balanced legislation to resolve these issues for the benefit of the Nation.

Since the President unveiled his proposal it has met with its share of criticism. I am not here today to defend it as a perfect product. But it is certainly a constructive place to begin discussions on the shape of a final legislative vehicle. I believe the President is willing to accept and respond to constructive suggestions for improvement. For example, during May of this year I was joined by Senator DOMENICI and 51 other of my Senate colleagues in writing to the President to urge him to incorporate certain principles in the acid rain control title of the administration bill. The President heeded these suggestions, and the administration bill offers a cost-effective opportunity to reduce the precursors of acid rain while protecting Louisiana ratepayers from bearing the burden of cleanup for polluters in other States. In addition, the acid rain provisions offer valuable market opportunities for the use of clean burning and abundant Louisiana natural gas, combining important environmental benefits with the addition of economic benefits for the State.

There are a number of provisions, of course, that remain to be improved. I intend to take a long and careful look at the adequacy of mobile source requirements contained in the bill. In particular, the fleet averaging provisions deserve special scrutiny. While automobile manufacturers have done much over the years to reduce auto emissions, mobile sources as a group continue to be the most sigificant contributor to the failure of our urban areas to attain the national ozone and carbon monoxide standards. Similarly, I believe that the alternative fuels program may have promise, but it raises a number of questions that will require thorough review.

Of all the provisions in the bill, I have the most serious reservations about the air toxics proposal contained in title III. As my colleagues may know, I was one of three members of the Committee on Environment and Public Works designated by the chairman of the Environmental Protection Subcommittee, Senator BAUCUS, to help craft an air toxics control bill for committee discussion and consideration. That bill, S. 816, is an aggressive and far-reaching proposal. It is my view that the President's proposal requires improvement in its handling of hazardous air emissions, and I intend to work closely with the President and my colleagues on the Environment and Public Works Committee to that end.

Mr. President, this bill has been criticized by some who question whether elements of the bill will, in fact, allow us to achieve the air quality goals enunciated by the President when he initially announced his proposal. It has been criticized by others as harmful to the competitive position of U.S. industry, fostering expensive regulatory approaches without significant air quality benefits. Many are concerned about who will bear the economic burdens which would result from this bill, and at what cost to our Nation.

Mr. President, I would expect these criticisms to be directed at any serious proposal that attempts to resolve these thorny problems. While the bill is not all I would like to see, I think President Bush has provided us with an impressive attempt to break the impasse on clean air and to provide leadership on this difficult issue. I have my own criticisms of the President's proposal. I do not agree with all of its features. Yet, that is to be expected in a package as detailed as this. That is to be expected in a pacakge that honestly attempts to reconcile the difficult policy choices that arise in this debate. I commend the President for his effort. I support much of what he has tried to accomplish in his proposal. I certainly commit to working with him, as I have to working with my colleagues in the Congress, to resolve issues and see rational and badly needed legislative improvements enacted into law during the 101st Congress.

MY HOME STATE OF MISSOURI

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, not many people are aware that my home State of Missouri is the birthplace of so many current Members of the U.S. Senate. Besides myself and Senator DANFORTH, the other members of this Show-Me-Club include Senators BURNS, BRADLEY, and WILSON, as well as our new Ambassador to the Bahamas, former Senator Chic Hecht.

Thus, it is with great pleasure that I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from Ambassador Hecht's hometown newspaper, the Southeast Missourian of Cape Giradeau, MO, be included in the RECORD.

Missourians are proud of their native sons, and the community of Cape Girardeau is no exception. All of us wish Ambassador Hecht the best of luck.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIVE SON GOOD CHOICE FOR A U.S. AMBASSADOR

Former Cape Girardean Chic Hecht has been named by President Bush to serve as ambassador to the Bahamas. He must be confirmed yet by the U.S. Senate, but his former colleagues in that chamber will no doubt recognize the wisdom of this appointment, as do we.

At first glance, this might seem just a cushy and sunny foreign post delivered as a reward for past loyalties to a Republican presidency. In fact, the Bahamas is a nation of strategic importance to the United States. Along with its reputation as a vaction paradise, the Bahamas is also at the crossroads of this hemisphere's drug trafficking, as well as being in close proximity to Cuba and Central and South American nations. The ambassador of the Bahamas must take an active role overseeing U.S. interests in combating drugs in that region, in addition to keeping a finger on the political pulse of the region. While the golf and fishing might be good, there is plenty of important work to do on behalf of Americans in the Caribbean.

Hecht seems uniquely qualified for the post. As a U.S. senator from Nevada between 1983–89, he is up to speed on international affairs. In addition, he has taken a special interest in the American war on drugs. Since the Bahamas has an international banking community, Hecht's 25 years of banking and business experience should also provide exceptional insight.

It is always special for a community to have a native son advance to an important job representing the United States. Even setting that local tie aside, however, we feel that President Bush has picked well for this job.

CITY OF JACKSON CELEBRATES 175TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. BOND. Mr. President, my colleague Mr. DANFORTH and I have the fortunate opportunity, as U.S. Senators from Missouri, to serve many of this Nation's finest rural communities. Today, we recognize one of those communities as it celebrates its 175th anniversary.

Located in the picturesque hills of Cape Girardeau County you will find this community whose theme, "The City of Beautiful Homes, Churches, and Schools," so aptly reflects its desires and achievements. When its forefathers first gathered in 1814 to choose a proper name, this assembly of pioneers chose to christen its town Jackson, in honor of one of our Nation's great leaders.

Andrew Jackson, our Nation's seventh President, would be proud today knowing of this small community's accomplishments during these past 175 years. The city of Jackson's commitment to progress and prosperity has been passed on from generation to generation, carrying with it a commitment to self-initiative, and a dedication to improvement.

In a recent letter to the citizens of Jackson, President Bush recognized this commitment and stated that their city is more than a collection of buildings, or a place on a map. He also stated that from its earliest days, it has nurtured the lives and accomplishments of countless individuals united through the years by a common love for the place they call home.

We agree with the President, and join with him in a special salute to the 175 years of fine tradition now being celebrated by the City of Beautiful Homes, Churches and Schools, Jackson, MO.

TERRY ANDERSON

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I rise once again to inform my colleagues that today is the 1,602d day that Terry Anderson has been held in captivity in Beirut.

As we leave this body for the August recess, I request that we continue to keep Terry Anderson in our thoughts and prayers.

I ask unanimous consent that a Los Angeles Times article on this matter which appeared on Christmas Day, 1987, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Times, Dec. 25, 1987]

HOSTAGE PLEADS FOR U.S. HELP

BEIRUT.—On his third Christmas Eve as a hostage, American journalist Terry A. Anderson told his family in a videotape released Thursday that he is well and pleaded with his government to do what it can to free him.

"To my family, I love you and miss you very much," he said in a strong, steady voice on the four-minute videotape, which Anderson's captors delivered to the British news agency Reuters in Muslim West Beirut. "I'm sorry we have to be apart again this Christmas.

"I'm in good health, but tired and very lonely. I think of you very much. Kiss my beautiful children for me and be patient."

LONGEST-HELD CAPTIVE

Anderson, who was kidnaped by Muslim extremists in West Beirut on March 16, 1985, is the longest-held foreign captive in Lebanon. His father and a brother have died during his captivity. One of his two daughters, Sulome, now 2, was born after his abduction.

The 40-year-old journalist, who was chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press, appeared to be reading from a prepared text as he pleaded for help from the U.S. government for the eight Americans held hostage in Lebanon, saying to President Reagan:

"Mr. President, I say again this cannot continue. This is my third Christmas as a hostage. Others have been [held] nearly as long.

"Surely it's enough? It has to be. Our condition is not great. There's a limit for how long we can last and some of us are approaching their limit very rapidly."

In Washington, State Department spokeswomen Phyllis Oakley said: "All statements by hostages are made under the duress of their captivity. We continue to be deeply concerned for the health and the well-being of all the hostages. They are not forgotten."

WAITE STILL A HOSTAGE

In addition to the eight Americans, at least 12 other foreigners are known to be hostages in Lebanon. Anglican church negotiator Terry Waite dropped from sight Jan. 20 after leaving his West Beirut hotel to meet with extremists and is now also considered a hostage.

Peggy Say, Anderson's sister, said at her home in Batavia, N.Y., that the message brightened an otherwise discouraging Christmas. "Next to his release, it's the best news we could have gotten."

In London, Robert A.K. Runcie, the Archbishop of Canterbury, made an impassioned appeal for the release of the Western hostages, especially Waite his personal envoy, his office said Thursday.

"At this sacred season I have no hesitation in making a special appeal to the religious and political leaders in Lebanon and the other countries which, in one way or another, may have influence on the captors." Runcie said.

Meanwhile, Joelle Kauffman, wife of French hostage Jean-Paul Kauffman, who was kidnaped in May, 1985, flew from Paris to Beirut on Thursday to be near her husband. Her trip to Beirut came amid reports that two Frenchmen and a West German captive would soon be set free.

On Thursday, two Lebanese newspapers reported that the three hostages would be released within the coming days.

"Two French hostages and German captive Rudolph Cordes will regain freedom within 48 hours during the glorious Christmas," the conservative Al Anwar newspaper reported. The pro-Syrian newspaper Al Shark said the release of the three captives would take place during the next fews days. The French hostages were not named in either newspaper report.

Anderson, in remarks directed to the Reagan Administration on the videotape, said that no progress has been apparent in efforts to free American captives since David P. Jacobsen of Huntington Beach, Calif., former director of the American University Hospital in Beirut, was released on Nov. 2, 1986.

He has appealed to Reagan for action in an earlier message delivered by his kidnapers, the pro-Iranian Shia Muslim extremist group Islamic Jihad (Islamic Holy War).

Anderson was bearded on the videotape. He wore spectacles and a light brown sweater. He said to Reagan:

"Surely by now you know what must be done and how you can do it. This is difficult, but you can do it. There has been enough careful consideration, cold discussion and enough intricate secret maneuvering and more than enough self-righteousness. . . .

"Mr. President, I'll say again, this cannot continue. There's a limit to how long we can last. Some of us are approaching that limit very rapidly. Surely by now, you know what must be done and how you can do it. I know this is a difficult and delicate matter, but you can do it."

In Washington, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said intelligence experts will examine the latest tape "for nuances" and any other information it holds about the hostages condition.

Asked what Washington is doing to secure the captives release, he said: "Everything we can."

Anderson said on the tape that conditions for himself and other hostages probably would improve if those of the 17 convicted pro-Iranian terrorists jailed in Kuwait get better.

"If something is done to improve their conditions, ours will too," he said, but did not describe his own situation.

Islamic Jihad has demanded freedom for the 17, who were convicted of bombing the U.S. and French embassies in Kuwait in December, 1983. It also holds Thomas Sutherland, an American who is acting dean of agriculture at the American University of Beirut, and at least three French hostages.

In addition to Anderson and Sutherland, the American hostages held by a variety of extremist groups in Lebanon are: Frank H. Reed, 53, director of the Lebanese International School in West Beirut; Joseph J. Cicippio, 56 acting controller of the American University of Beirut; Edward A. Tracy, 56, a salesman; Alann Steen, 48, a journalism professor at Beirut University College; Jesse Turner, 39, a mathematics instructor at Beirut University College, and Robert Pohill, 53, an assistant business professor at the same institution.

THE WAR AND TREATY POWERS: UPHOLDING CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLE

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, one of the more unfortunate of modern political fashions has been the propensity, grown pervasive over the past four decades, of officials in the executive branch to stretch the Constitution without amending it—by asserting, through word and deed, the existence of far-reaching, sometimes virtually unlimited, and supposedly inherent Presidential authorities, particularly in the realm of foreign affairs. Motivating this executive aggrandizement is a belief that America's world role has become so great that we can ill afford, in exercising our weighty responsibilities, to be constrained by constitutional niceties—that is, by the balance between President and Congress so clearly and artfully envisaged by the Framers.

Surely it is one of our age's more poignant ironies that those most active in seeking to change our Constitution, either formally or by gradual distortion, are proud to style themselves as conservatives.

Against these tendencies, one can only offer an admonition and a pledge to heed it. This admonition, to all those who serve in our national government, is that our responsibility—in Congress and the Executive alike—is twofold: not only to develop and implement policies that serve the Nation's interests and but also to act as custodians of constitutional institutions we have every reason to treat as sacred.

Too often, I submit, this custodial role has been misconstrued—especially by presidential advisers propelled by the notion that the Nation's identity is somehow congruent with the office of the Presidency: that if and as the President's powers are expanded, so too is the Nation's welfare. Surely this is a misunderstanding. The framers did, in their wisdom, plan that the branches of government, each with its own powers, would check one another and thereby preserve a balance. But such a plan is far from an invitation to each branch to seek the expansion of its powers until aggrandizement is frustrated. The Constitution's framers cannot have hoped that balance would be maintained only by institutional battle and that our Government would be devoid of those who would seek balance as an end in itself.

Mr. President, I wish to call to the Senate's attention the work of one of our colleagues, the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, in seeking with extraordinary care and purpose to maintain that balance which the framers saw as the essence of American Government. I refer today to Senator BIDEN's work with regard to two constitutional powers crucial to the conduct of American foreign policy: the war power and the treaty power—each assigned, by the Constitution's allocation of particular functions, as a power to be shared by the President and Congress.

Both of these powers have recently been the focus of contention. A prolonged dispute over the nature of the war power gained renewed intensity with the dispatch of a major American naval contingent to the Persian Gulf. And a new and unprecedented dispute over the treaty power was occasioned by the Reagan administration's effort to "reinterpret," and thereby fundamentally alter, a long-standing arm control treaty of bedrock significance. Entering both of these debates, Senator BIDEN made a remarkable contribution, both intellectually and practically.

On the treaty power, Senator BIDEN in 1987 chaired extensive joint hearings of the Foreign Relations and Judiciary Committees, entitled "The ABM Treaty and the Constitution." These hearings laid the groundwork for the Senate's historic debate over the treaty power in 1988 in connection with ratification of the INF Treaty, a debate that culminated in Senate approval, by an overwhelming margin, of a stipulation—a precondition of ratification—called the Biden condition. This episode has now been detailed, in all of its constitutional implications, in a law review article co-authored by Senator BIDEN in the University of Pennsylvania Law Review. I concur with Senator NUNN, who has written that passage of that measure will eventually be seen as one of the Senate's finest hours. This is true, not because the Biden condition expanded the Senate's powers but because it achieved its admirable purpose, well described by Senator BIDEN as "upholding a constitutional partnership."

In a similar vein, Senator BIDEN addressed himself to the question of the war power. As chairman of a Special Subcommittee on War Powers established by the Foreign Relations Committee, he last year held extensive hearings, later published under a title reflecting the situation those hearings so clearly underscored: "The War Power After 200 Years: Congress and the President at a Constitutional Impasse." On the basis of those hearings, Senator BIDEN has now co-authored in the Georgetown Law Journal a lucid law review article detailing a specific and well-considered proposal for overcoming that impasse.

Derived from a clear assessment of both constitutional precept and utilitarian need, Senator BIDEN's war power proposal embodies two principles: first, the operational imperative that the President have unambiguous authority to cope with a full range of military contingencies that may require prompt and effective action; and second, the constitutional—and practical—imperative for clear-cut congressional approval if the United States is to engage in sustained hostilities. I commend this article to my colleagues and to those in the executive branch willing to contemplate a fresh look at an argument now characterized on both sides by little more than the recitation of dogma. Just as he led the Senate toward a satisfactory resolution of the constitutional dispute over the treaty power, I believe Senator BIDEN's current proposal offers the possibility of a constitutionally and practically sound outcome with regard to the war power.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that both law review articles be published in the RECORD. In their treatment of solemn constitutional issues, they reflect a standard of scholarship and seriousness that I admire immensely and that contributes still further to my esteem for my colleague from Delaware. His was the first State to ratify the Constitution, and it has given the Senate a distinguished modern leader to defend it.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WAR POWER AT A CONSTITUTIONAL IMPASSE: A "JOINT DECISION" SOLUTION

(By Senator Joseph R. Biden, Jr. and John B. Ritch II)

I. INTRODUCTION

During a period of relative tranquility at home and abroad, the question of how America goes to war begins to seem academic if not anachronistic. But the war power occupies a solemn place in our constitutional system, and if history is any guide, the issue—not just of war, but the process by which we decide on it—will once again acquire prominence and passion. This abiding question warrants dispassionate analysis in the calm before those fevers arise.

With the American Constitution now 200 years old, one might expect so fundamental a question to have been resolved—by two centuries of constitutional experience, if not by the Constitution itself. But in fact the reverse has occurred. Today the war power question is debated not in its nuances, but in its essence by two sharply conflicting factions whose arguments are charged with all the energy and ideology of two decades of dispute over policy and principle.

Ironically, the focus for this contention—the lightning rod—is a sixteen-year-old law intended by its framers to resolve the issue and facilitate harmony by establishing a constitutionally sound and functioning mechanism for decision. At least thus far, this admirable aim has met defeat.

Enacted over the veto of President Nixon, who attacked it as an unconstitutional infringement on the Executive's powers as Commander in Chief, the War Powers Resolution of 1973 [1] was heeded by President Ford and affirmatively accepted by President Carter.[2] But the 1980s saw the dispute resurrected, as the Reagan Administration, abetted by former President Ford speaking in a newly critical voice and by an Executive-oriented element in Congress, grew steadily bolder in denouncing both the Resolution and its underlying rationale. Meanwhile others in Congress continue to regard the War Powers Resolution as sound in its constitutional premises, even if imperfect in its details, and to insist upon presidential compliance.

With the conflict having degenerated into trench warfare, we have reached what amounts to a constitutional impasse that will debilitate American foreign policy for so long as it goes unresolved. While the prospects for a solution appear unpromising, that goal should be the object of a genuine search. For the achievement of broad agreement on the constitutional parameters surrounding the war power, and the codification of this consensus in accepted procedures, would serve the nation not only in time of crisis, but by fostering greater comity and clearer focus—on the part of both the Executive and the Congress—in the constant interation from which American foreign policy emerges.

Symptom of the impasse: a chronic debate over procedure

The most recent case in point arose in 1987, when the Reagan Administration placed Kuwaiti oil tankers under the American flag and committed the United States Navy to protect those vessels in the Persian Gulf. As this policy rather haphazardly emerged, the Administration presented it as a simple matter of principle—an assertion of the right of innocent passage on the high seas. In fact, Administration policy represented nothing less than a major commitment of American forces on the Iraqi side in the Iran-Iraq War.[3]

Whatever its ultimate wisdom or folly, this action was a complex, high-risk undertaking not at all self-evident in its justification. With American forces about to begin a mission entailing a considerable possibility that the United States would be drawn into one of this century's bloodiest wars, surely a significant debate was in order—whether in public closed doors—to establish the requisite congressional support. Yet that debate hardly occurred. Instead, Congress quickly descended, as it has several times in recent years, into a debate not on the policy at issue but on the procedure—specifically, how the requirements of the War Powers Resolution might apply, and indeed whether that law is even constitutional.[4]

Such a focus on procedure was no doubt inevitable since the Administration had, by defying the requirements of the War Powers Resolution, denied Congress any role in a decision portending United States involvement in a major war. Nonetheless, intellectual energies needed for analysis of the national interest in the situation were diverted, as on prior occasions, into frenzied argument over legalisms. Did these circumstances fulfill the criterion of "hostilities or . . . imminent involvement in hostilities," as specified in the War Powers Resolution? If so, when had the sixty-day time clock for congressional authorization begun to run? Since the President had not sent Congress the required report, which would clearly trigger the clock, how could anyone know for sure that the clock was running? Could Congress make it run? Et cetera.

Essence of the Problem: Two Sharply Divergent Views

In late 1987, recognizing such digressive and divisive debate as a chronic phenomenon rather than an exceptional incident, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee established the Special Subcommittee on War Powers to review and reassess the entire problem.[5] During 1988, the Subcommittee held extensive hearings involving some thirty witnesses—including a former President, key legislators involved in originating the War Powers Resolution, current and former Secretaries of Defense and State, current and former Chairmen of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the State Department Legal Adviser, and numerous historians and constitutional scholars.[6]

Several witnesses articulated what has become a commonplace: that enactment of the War Powers Resolution in 1973 was little more than a misguided symptom of congressional disillusion with the Vietnam War and that matters could be straightened out if Congress simply would repeal the law.[7] But in fact, as the hearings underscored, what is at stake is a profound constitutional issue, defined by a fundamental divergence of view which, in historic perspective, has appeared only recently, and which will not be resolved by the expedient of erasing an existing law. This divergence concerns the nature and extent of the inherent constitutional authority of the President to commit the United States to hostilities. It is conflict over this authority, not the existing law, that is the essence of our current problem.

One view can fairly be labeled "monarchist." This model sees the President as having virtually unlimited authority to deploy and use the armed forces in pursuit of what he regards as the national interest. Monarchists concede that Congress can act to constrain the President, but they argue that the only congressional power relevant to warmaking is the power of the purse.[8] In short, if the President starts a war to which Congress objects, Congress can always cut off the money to wage it. Certainly this is a clean division of labor. But what merits debate is whether it is a constitutionally mandated division of labor or even a desirable one considering its ultimate effect on American foreign policy.

The practical implications of the monarchist model are sobering. Congress will never fail to provide overall funding for the armed forces, and the President can veto military appropriations bills containing restrictions he finds unacceptable. Thus, under the monarchist model, in order to stop a President from using American forces in a particular way, Congress faces the task of passing a specifically restrictive law over his veto. Monarchists would thus grant a determined President a free hand so long as he sustains the support of one-third-plus-one in either house. Under this model, even if Congress eventually asserts its will by insisting that the President sign an appropriations bill with restrictive amendments, the role envisaged for Congress is purely reactive and negative—a role played only after a presidential policy has been unilaterally implemented and has gone awry.

The alternative view advanced herein is a "joint decision" model.[9] Its premise is that there are indeed limits on the President's independent power to commit forces to combat—limits that, while not precisely defined in the Constitution, exist nonetheless and may be delineated in codified, constitutionally sound procedure. In this view, the President draws his independent authority not from some robust concept of the President as an all-knowing and nearly omnipotent Commander in Chief, but from a more limited Executive responsibility to protect the nation and its citizens from immediate threats. Under the joint decision model, presidential power to use force in the absence of statutory authorization derives from the concept of emergency: the need to repel an attack on the United States or its forces, to forestall an imminent attack, or to rescue United States citizens whose lives are imperiled. Conversely, any policy involving a sustained use of force must derive from an affirmative decision of the entire government, including Congress.

Evaluating these two models is complex not only because the Constitution itself is vague but also because custom and practice—the deeds of two centuries of American history—offer a wealth of examples that are cited to support both sides of the argument. Such confusion tends to work in favor of the monarchist model by inducing a kind of collective constitutional shoulder shrug—an attitude that, since the Constitution appears unclear, perhaps we would do best to let the President get on with the business of defending American interests as he sees fit. On the other hand, the constitutional situation is, upon examination, not as murky as the monarchists would have it.

Intent of the Framers

The intent of the Framers of the Constitution cannot resolve this debate,[10] but is the logically necessary point from which to begin when the text itself seems unclear.[11] The Constitution they drafted is, in its allocation of powers affecting foreign policy, "cryptic and ambiguous"[12]—and, one must conclude, purposefully so. The greatness of the Framers lay not only in what they knew but in their wise recognition of what they could not know. In foreign policy they recognized the need for flexibility. As Alexander Hamilton wrote in the Federalist, "[I]t is impossible to foresee or to define the extent and variety of national exigencies. . . . The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite; and for this reason, no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed."[13]

But rejecting "shackles" did not mean rejecting processes by allocating foreign policy to one unconstrained authority. Clearly, the Framers wished to repose strong executive power in the President—to overcome the chaos that had characterized government under the Articles of Confederation. But on the question of warmaking, the Framers' throughts were dominated by their experience with the British King, whose power, as analyzed by Blackstone, included "the sole prerogative of making war and peace."[14] Such powers the Framers were determined to deny to the President. Accordingly, even so staunch an advocate of presidential power as Hamilton emphasized that the President's power as Commander in Chief would be "much inferior" to that of the King, amounting to "nothing more than the supreme command and direction of the military and naval forces."[15] This power was not to include the decision on war itself.

Indeed, an early draft of the Constitution reserved exclusively for Congress the power to "make war."[16] Later this was changed to "declare war." But the reason for the change is instructive. In the convention, James Madison and Elbridge Gerry argued for the amendment solely in order to allow the President "the power to repel sudden attacks."[17]

The Framers had no interest in the ceremonial aspects of declaring war. Even then, as Hamilton noted, "[T]he ceremony of a formal denunciation of war" had "of late fallen into disuse."[18] The real issue was congressional authorization of war. And on that issue there appears little doubt that the Framers' aim was to empower the President to respond when war was imposed on the nation, but not to empower him to undertake war on his own.

II. THE WAR POWER THROUGH TWO CENTURIES

Constitutional practice: 1789 to the Civil War

In the early years of the new Republic, James Madison summarized the Framers' intent in a letter to Thomas Jefferson: "The Constitution supposes, what the History of all Govts demonstrates, that the Ex. is the branch of power most interested in war, & most prone to it. It has accordingly with studied care vested the question of war in the Legisl."[19]

Since a fair reading of the Framers' intent makes it difficult to draw any conclusion at odds with Madison's authoritative summation, modern-day monarchists must rest their constitutional arguments less on original intent than on constitutional practice, in which they claim to discern a long history of support.[20] Let us therefore scan the two centuries for evidence and themes. Does American history confer legitimacy on presidential warmaking?

The first potential example for the monarchist case arose when President John Adams deployed naval forces in an undeclared war with France from 1798 to 1801. But on examination this episode can offer the monarchists little solace, for Adams actually sought and obtained congressional support. Indeed, Congress ultimately became more belligerent than Adams, passing a number of measures aimed at encouraging successful prosecution of the conflict.[21]

The young Republic's war with France also produced significant Supreme Court decisions bearing on the question of limited war, a phenomenon that modern monarchists often suggest lies outside the provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution itself had touched on this subject by reserving for Congress the authority to grant "Letters of Marque and Reprisal," [22] licenses issued to private citizens empowering them to seize enemy ships in an 18th century version of limited war. But the Court's rulings made the matter of limited war still clearer. Wars, the Court said, even if "imperfect," are nonetheless wars.[23] Moreover, Chief Justice John Marshall ruled that "Congress may authorize general hostilities . . . or partial hostilities." [24] In short, all war—not just full-scale "perfect" war, but also limited war—falls within the constitutional concept of war.

In still another case arising from this conflict, Little v. Baremme,[25] Chief Justice Marshall rendered a decision of enormous importance in defining the scope of the President's inherent powers. Congress had barred all commerce with France and authorized the seizure of American vessels bound for France.[26] Marshall ruled that Congress had thereby clearly implied a limit on the President's power in enforcing the ban. Thus, the seizure of an American vessel sailing from France conflicted with the congressional will and was therefore illegal. By acting, Congress had preempted presidential discretion.[27]

Modern monarchists also refer habitually to the actions of Adams' successor, Thomas Jefferson, in coping with the Barbary pirates, whose attacks on shipping caused Jefferson to dispatch the Navy and brought the United States into a limited and undeclared war with Tripoli from 1801 to 1804.[28] But note President Jefferson's concept of the constraints on his inherent power: United States naval forces, he told Congress, were "unauthorized by the Constitution, without the sanction of Congress, to go beyond the line of defense."[29] He thereupon requested "authorizing measures of offense," which Congress quickly granted.[30]

Jefferson spoke similarly a few years later. Having made history's sharpest real estate deal by purchasing Louisiana, he addressed himself to the question of whether American forces should be used against the Spanish, whose incursions from Florida posed a threat to the newly acquired territory. Jefferson told Congress that

"Considering that Congress alone is constitutionally invested with the power of changing our condition from peace to war, I have thought it my duty to await their authority for using force . . . . The course to be pursued will require the command of means which it belongs to Congress exclusively to yield or deny."[31]

The War of 1812, during the presidency of James Madison, does not bear on either side of our modern-day argument over the war power. It was the first of our five declared wars,[32] the only one in which the declaration was not simply a formality acknowledging the prior existence of war, and holds historical interest primarily as a reminder that Congress is not always more peaceloving than the President. In spoiling for a fight, the War Hawks in Congress were way ahead of Madison.[33]

But our second declared war, with Mexico in 1846, does hold relevance to the current constitutional predicament. Hostilities began when President Polk sent American troops into disputed border territory, where they were attacked by Mexican forces defending Mexico's claim. Congress responded by declaring war.[34] two years later, with the war still on, the House of Representatives, convinced by now that it had been hoodwinked by a presidential fait accompli, resolved that the war had been "unnecessarily and unconstitutionally begun by the President of the United States."[35]

An elderly Congressman, former President John Quincy Adams, who had served a quarter century earlier as James Monroe's Secretary of State and had devised the famous doctrine that bore Monroe's name, gave his last hours in public life to denouncing Polk's effort to justify the war as an application of the Monroe Doctrine.[36] Meanwhile, a younger colleague, Congressman Abraham Lincoln, offered a classic articulation of the dilemma of presidential warmaking we face today:

"Allow the President to invade a neighboring nation, whenever he shall deem it necessary to repel an invasion . . . and you allow him to make war at pleasure. Study to see if you can fix any limit to his power in this . . . . If today, he should choose to say he thinks it necessary to invade Canada, to prevent the British from invading us, how could you stop him? You may say to him, "I see no probability of the British invading us," but he will say to you, "Be silent; I see it, if you don't."[37]

The President's ability to deploy forces with major effect was displayed again just a few years later, in 1854, when Franklin Pierce sent Commodore Perry and a naval squadron to "open up" Japan through a persuasive show of power. But there also were many other, less conspicuous deployments. In the thirty years before the Civil War, U.S. naval forces were used without specific congressional authorization in more than a dozen instances to deal with pirates or unobliging natives in locations ranging from Africa to the South Pacific.[38]

Significantly, however, Presidents continued to pay heed to the distinction between deploying forces and the authority to initiate hostilities. Polk, after all, did obtain a declaration of war before proceeding to wage the Mexican conflict his deployment of forces had precipitated. On the eve of the Civil War, President James Buchanan summed up the state of the war power after some seventy years of constitutional practice: "[W]ithout the authority of Congress the President cannot fire a hostile gun in any case except to repel the attacks of an enemy."[39]

Constitutional practice: the Civil War to 1950

In the Civil War itself, President Lincoln undertook such sweeping measures in the absence of congressional authorization that one Supreme Court Justice labeled Lincoln's presidency a "military depotism."[40] But Lincoln's actions, in the context of a domestic rebellion threatening the very survival of the nation, bear little on the question of the use of force abroad.[41]

In the last third of the 19th century, the country looked westward; and American history begins to offer modern monarchists some vague precedent for their case only after a rising imperialist instinct had produced our third declared war: the Spanish-American War of 1898.[42] Victory over Spain made the United States a world power, and brought with it the terriorial gains of conquest. In the newly acquired Philippines, U.S. forces quickly became mired in an undeclared, unauthorized, and far bloodier war with our new subjects. This savage counterinsurgency, involving some 130,000 American troops, presaged in many respects the much later tragedy in Vietnam.[43]

The Philippines, of course, was at least technically a United States possession: China was not. There President McKinley opened the new century—and set the tone for a more presidentially assertive phase in our constitutionally history—by dispatching five thousand American troops to join an international force that quickly put down the Boxer Rebellion. McKinley did so without congressional authorization, using as his pretext the protection of American lives and property.[44] His action aroused no congressional objection, paving the way for similar exercises of unilateral power by Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson in the Caribbean and Latin America in the years before World War I.[45] President Wilson did obtain our fourth official declaration of war before sending troops to Europe in 1917,[46] but did not seek congressional authorization when he dispatched troops to Siberia after the First World War had ended.[47]

From an historical perspective, the century's first two decades had served to raise the war power issue. But the monarchist model had by no means established itself, as President Wilson soon discovered. In one of several formal reservations he attached to the Versailles Treaty, the Republican Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Henry Cabot Lodge, stipulated that Congress had the "sole power" to "authorize the employment of the military or naval forces."[48] (Such views, it is interesting to recall, were once the essence of Republicanism.)[49] Lodge's reservations, which killed the treaty's ratification, expressed sentiments—against presidential discretion and for isolationism—that were to govern American policy for the next two decades.[50] By 1939, the outbreak of war in Europe found President Franklin Roosevelt heavily constrained both by strict neutrality laws and by the balance of power in Congress.[51]

For two years, before Pearl Harbor produced our fifth and last declaration of war[52] and ended American isolationism forever, Roosevelt pressed against such limits to the utmost. He exchanged American destroyers for British bases by executive agreement, sent American troops to Greenland and Iceland, and instituted a convoy system in the North Atlantic, issuing "shoot on sight" orders to the United States Navy.[53] Yet when Senator Robert Taft challenged the constitutionality of the move into Iceland, Roosevelt responded not with sweeping claims of inherent presidential authority but by continuing to maneuver as best he could to prepare the United States for the war he expected to come.[54] In perhaps his most significant prewar policy, Lend-Lease, Roosevelt sought and obtained congressional authorization.[55]

When World War II ended, leaving the United States a superpower supreme on the world stage, the constitutional status of the war power still appeared reasonably clear. Through a century and a half, Presidents had on numerous occasions used troops for police actions and, in the free-wheeling period before World War I, had even installed provisional governments in Latin America. It also was generally recognized, as Lincoln had discerned, that a presidential deployment of forces could in itself create the circumstances that might lead to hostilities. Yet our history to that point offers little true support for the monarchist model. Presidents had on numerous occasions acted unilaterally under the justification of defending American citizens or forces. But no President had ever asserted an inherent right to take the nation to war.

All this was about to change, although not immediately. In the five years following the Second World War, the Truman Administration courted Congress assiduously to ensure support for America's new world role.[56] The establishment of the United Nations,[57] the beginning of the international exchange program,[58] aid to Greece and Turkey under the Truman Doctrine,[59] the launching of the Marshall Plan,[60] and the creation of NATO[61] pursuant to the Vandenburg Resolution[62]—all had the full participation and imprimatur of Congress. Neither Truman nor his representatives suggested any challenge to "the constitutional premise that U.S. commitments abroad required an Executive-Legislative partnership and were impossible by Executive fiat.[63]

Thus, and this bears emphasis, the era now fondly regarded as "the golden age of bipartisanship" in American foreign policy was a product not only of international statesmanship at both ends of Pennsylvania Avenue, but also of a Truman presidency that did not, during its first five years, seek to test the limits of Executive prerogative.[64]

The postwar period: "monarchism" in bloom

With the outbreak of the Korean War, this pattern of constitutional partnership was skewered by an unprecedented presidential assertion. In June 1950, in dispatching American naval and ground forces to the defense of South Korea, the Truman Administration declined to seek congressional authorization and instead asserted, with elaborate legal argument, an inherent presidential authority to act unilaterally to protect the "broad interests of American foreign policy." [65]

The full constitutional significance of this "fateful moment" [66] was obscured at the time.[67] But in fact an extraordinary transformation had occurred in Executive-Legislative relations. As former Senator J. William Fulbright recently reflected:

"With the famous bipartisanship of the late 1940s, the Senate and the House of Representatives had cooperated in a series of steps by which the United States assumed a role of world leadership. But having done so, Congress found itself facing an Executive that would point to these global responsibilities as justification for bypassing traditional requirements for congressional approval.[68]

For many who would later condemn it—such as Fulbright [69] and historian Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.[70]—the emergence of a monarchist approach to foreign policy did not originally appear unwarranted or dangerous. Indeed, it seemed the unavoidable and rational response to compelling circumstances. America's pre-World War II isolationism was now regarded asymptomatic of congressional myopia, while the President as Commander in Chief had acquired tremendous stature during the war and in the formation of postwar alliances. Meanwhile, the emerging Cold War posed ominous uncertainties to which the nuclear age added an overarching danger. In such an environment, Truman, Eisenhower, and Kennedy seemed far safer custodians of the national security than a Congress which in the 1950s "allowed itself to become a forum for the shameful anti-communists witchhunt of McCarthyism" [71] and which remained, even thereafter, a hothouse of parochialism. To many reasonable observers, proponents of congressional prerogative were seen as agents not of constitutional balance but of unenlightened reaction.

By 1960, Dean Rusk, in an article that presaged his service as Secretary of State for Presidents Kennedy and Johnson, was able to write in Foreign Affairs: "As Commander in Chief the President can deploy the Armed Forces and order them into active operation. In an age of missiles and hydrogen warheads, his powers are as large as the situation requires. . . ." [72] A year later, as the United States crossed into the New Frontier, Senator Fulbright, by now chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, reflected the tenor of the times and of prevailing congressional sentiment with these extraordinary words:

"[T]he price of democratic survival in a world of aggressive totalitarianism is to give up some of the democratic luxuries of the past. We should do so with no illusions as to the reasons for its necessity. It is distasteful and dangerous to vest the executive with powers unchecked and unbalanced. My question is whether we have any choice but to so do." [73]

Within four years, Fulbright himself took the lead in saying yes, there was a choice. The turning point, in early 1965, was President Johnson's dispatch of 22,000 U.S. troops to the Dominican Republic. While rationalized as a rescue of endangered Americans, this action came as a sudden throwback to the gunboat diplomacy of a half century before.

But the compelling and defining issue was, of course, Vietnam. In 1964, prior to the presidential election, Johnson had engineered the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution arguing privately that a demonstration of American unity would help him avoid any deeper involvement in Southeast Asia.[74] By the summer of 1965, however, the Administration had begun its escalation, citing the Resolution in the process.[75] Fulbright's break with Johnson ended a long-time friendship and set the stage for the televised Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings that were to become, in the late 1960s, the principal public forum for the nation's growing disenchantment with the Vietnam war.

By eliciting the Tonkin Gulf Resolution, albeit under dubious pretenses, Johnson at least had paid some deference to the concept of congressional authorization for the use of force. But with the election of Richard Nixon, monarchism reached full bloom. At the time of the Korean intervention, Secretary of State Acheson had pleaded expediency.[76] Two decades later, the argument of expediency had become doctrine. In 1970, when President Nixon sent U.S. forces into Cambodia with neither congressional authorization nor even consultation, his accompanying assertions of autonomous presidential power [77] were so sweeping and so extreme that the Foreign Relations Committee began a search, led by Senator Jacob Javits, for some means of rectifying what was now perceived as a dangerous constitutional imbalance. The result, three years and scores of hearings later, was the War Powers Resolution—a somewhat flawed compromise between differing Senate and House versions.[78]

III. THE WAR POWERS RESOLUTION: A FLAWED EFFORT TO RIGHT THE BALANCE

The mechanism envisaged by the War Powers Resolution is simple. If the President introduces U.S. forces into "Hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances," he is required under § 4(a)(1) to report within forty-eight hours to Congress. Under § 5(b), this report triggers a sixty/ninety-day period [79] within which the President must obtain congressional authorization if hostilities are to be sustained.[80] Before expiration of that period, Congress may also, under § 5(c), require by concurrent resolution that the action be terminated.[81]

Unfortunately, the Resolution contains readily identifiable flaws. The Resolution begins with an attempt to enumerate comprehensively the President's authorities to use force but—primarily as a result of a flawed bargaining process between competing House and Senate versions—presents them inadequately. Section 2(c) lists only three authorities: (1) pursuant to a declaration of war; (2) pursuant to specific statutory authorization; and (3) in order to repel an attack on U.S. territory or forces. It thus omits two circumstances—rescuing Americans and forestalling an imminent attack—that had been in the original Senate version and that most constitutional scholars would place under the heading of the President's established constitutional authority and responsibility.

The Resolution then raises puzzling questions about the relationship between those authorities it cites and the sixty-day clock. According to § 5(b), the clock does not apply if Congress has declared war or enacted a statutory authorization for a specific use of force. Nor does it apply if Congress is physically unable to meet as a result of an attack on the United States. Thus, the Resolution exempts from the workings of its central mechanism virtually every action it affirms as residing within the President's authority.

The Resolution, by its own logic, does not exempt from the sixty-day clock the circumstances in which the President has acted within his acknowledged constitutional authority to repel an attack and Congress, though able to meet, has not provided a declaration of war or a statutory authorization. The Resolution thereby appears to apply a sixty-day limit to an inherent presidential power that, quite arguably, cannot be so limited. This logical flaw, and the rather glaring omissions of § 2(c), have made the Resolution an easy target for its critics.

No critic was more biting than Senator Sam Ervin, who focused on the repelling-invasion scenario during the 1973 Senate debate:

"This measure is an absurdity. It says that when the United States is invaded, Armed Forces of the United States must get out of the fight against an invader at the end of [sixty] days if Congress does not take affirmative action within that time to authorize the President to continue to employ the Armed Forces to resist the invasion . . . . [This means] the President must convert Old Glory into a white flag . . . if Congress does not expressly authorize him to perform the duty the Constitution imposes on him to protect the Nation against invasion." [82]

A fuller statement of presidential powers in § 2(c) would not only have been sounder constitutionally, but would have provided a reasonable application of the sixty-day clock to the presidential powers acknowledged by the Resolution. Specifically, had § 2(c) affirmed the President's constitutional authority to rescue Americans and to forestall attacks on the United States and its armed forces, it would be arguable that such presidential authorities to act abroad, though constitutionally derived, depend on the rationale of emergency and therefore are limited in time and scope. Under these circumstances, the sixty-day clock could be defended as a mechanism to implement the principle that the President may respond to certain emergencies but may not transform them into a policy of protracted warfare without congressional approval.

Since the War Powers Resolution did not recognize these additional powers, however, and since the authorities on the actual list are not limited by the sixty-day clock (or, in the case of repelling attack, not properly limited), the Resolution carries the unavoidable implication that its clock mechanism is intended to apply to presidential initiatives undertaken without proper authority. This implied expectation—that the President regularly will overstep his constitutional authority—weakens the Resolution substantially. As Professor Louis Henkin testified, "Declarations of constitutional limitation on the President are undermined if Congress proceeds to assume that he will violate them and prescribes procedures for such violations." [83]

Indeed, the implied assumption of routine presidential excess raises a practical question: If Congress expects the President to violate constitutional limits in committing forces, why expect his dutiful adherence to a legislated time limit on keeping forces deployed?

There is, it should be noted, one way to avoid construing the Resolution as implying an expectation that the President will exceed his proper authority. But to do so, one must construe the Resolution as constituting, in and of itself, an authorization under which the President may wage war for sixty/ninety days. While this certainly was not the congressional intent,[84] one of the War Powers Resolution's original champions, Senator Thomas Eagleton, recognized the danger that such an inference would be drawn and denounced the Resolution in its final form for that reason.[85]

Still another flaw—many would argue—lies in § 5(c), which permits Congress to require a cessation of military action by concurrent resolution. In the aftermath of the Supreme Court's 1983 decision in INS v. Chadha,[86] which found that legislative vetoes violate the Constitution's presentment clause,[87] most scholars who otherwise support the Resolution's constitutionality accept the unconstitutionality of § 5(c).[88] Although this view is by no means universal,[89] defenders of the Resolution are generally disposed to see this subsection repealed because it is not crucial to the Resolution's purposes and serves "only to provide an excuse for denunciation and defiance of the entire Resolution." [90]

While these flaws did not escape notice at the time of enactment, an even more fundamental flaw in the War Powers Resolution was not anticipated—the impotence of the Resolution's basic mechanism if a President capitalizes on ambiguities available in the § 4 reporting requirement. Section 4(a) of the Resolution provides that:

In the absence of a declaration of war, in any case in which United States Armed Forces are introduced—

(1) into hostilities or into situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances;

(2) into the territory, airspace or water of a foreign nation, while equipped for combat, except for deployments which relate solely to supply, replacement, repair, or training of such forces; or

(3) in numbers which substantially enlarge United States Armed Forces equipped for combat already located in a foreign nation; the President shall submit within 48 hours to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to the President pro tempore of the Senate a report, in writing, setting forth—

(A) the circumstances necessitating the introduction of United States Armed Forces;

(B) the constitutional and legislative authority under which such introduction took place;

(C) the estimated scope and duration of the hostilities or involvement.[91]

Section 5(b) stipulates that the clock begins when "a report is submitted or required to be submitted pursuant to section 4(a)(1)." but since a decision by the President not to submit a report leaves unresolved whether a report was "required to be submitted," the clock is unambiguously triggered only when a report is actually transmitted and when it explicitly identifies the situation as one described in § 4(a)(1).[92] Conversely, if the report provides some or all of the information required by subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C), but fails to affirm the existence of a § 4(a)(1) situation, the applicability of the clock is again left in doubt. Since the Resolution's enactment, Presidents have used this ambiguity to their advantage by doing precisely that, nodding in the direction of the War Powers Resolution while avoiding formal acceptance of its fundamental mechanism.[93]

In the past sixteen years, Congress has received nearly a score of presidential reports described as "consistent with" the War Powers Resolution. Only one has made specific reference to § 4(a)(1): President Ford's 1975 report on the Mayaguez incident, submitted after the event.[94] Thus, in the entire history of the War Powers Resolution, the sixty-day clock has never been unambiguously triggered. As in the recent United States naval deployments and hostilities in the Persian Gulf, Congress has been left to engage in periodic debates about the constitutionality of the law and the President's degree of compliance with it—examining only secondarily the substantive merits of the policy at issue.

OPTIONS TODAY

But if the War Powers Resolution has never worked as envisaged, the question remains: Could it work? Could such a framework facilitate, rather than complicate, Executive-Legislative interaction in the decision to use American forces abroad?

Certainly the Resolution's flaws described here do not make the case for repeal; they are correctable. The "legislative veto" provision is severable and can be repealed. Any implied time limit on the President's authority to repel attacks on the United States could be excised. And the list of inherent presidential authorities could be expanded, thereby removing the two deleterious implications mentioned earlier: that the clock applies only in instances in which the President has already violated the stated limits on his authority or, alternatively, that the Resolution bestows presidential powers beyond those a President would otherwise possess. Together, these alterations deprive the Resolution's critics—right and left—of their principal constitutional complaints.

Moreover, the most common operational criticism of the Resolution—that Congress could shirk its responsibility by inaction, leaving the President high and dry and forcing a withdrawal after sixty days[95]—is simply spurious, an allegation that has achieved effect not by persuasive force but through sheet repetition. Indeed, under the logic of the Resolution, it is difficult to imagine how withdrawal-via-inaction could occur, because § 6 guarantees highly expedited legislative procedures insuring time-certain voting on any authorization measure introduced pursuant to the President's submission of a § 4(a)(1) report. This means that, in either house, any one of the President's supporters could introduce a measure—providing precisely the authorization sought by the President—that would automatically reach a vote within a matter of days.

Thus, the criticism of potential congressional inaction is not only groundless but ironic. The problem is not that Congress may fail to give the President an answer; the problem is that Presidents have refused to ask.

Presidents have refused to ask for such authorization—not just under the War Powers Resolution, but beginning with Truman—on the basis of the relatively modern notion that to do so would weaken the Presidency. One must wonder whether, in acting on this rationale, they have succumbed, as the Foreign Relations Committee argued in 1970, to the dubious "notion that great Presidents are those who act effectively to strengthen the office of the Presidency as distinguished from strengthening the constitutional system as a whole."[96] The Committee quoted historian Thomas Bailey:

"The bare fact that a President was a strong one, or a domineering one, does not necessarily mean that he was a great one or even a good one. The crucial questions arise: Was he strong in the right direction? Was he a dignified, fair, constitutional ruler, serving the ends of democracy in a democratic and ethical manner?[97]

One must also ask whether, in their resistance to the very idea of the War Powers Resolution, Presidents have failed to take advantage of the real benefits such a procedure offers for registering, quickly if necessary, a formal expression of national consensus behind key policies that depend on broad support of success. The truth is that any presidential policy involving a use of force enjoys an enormous presumption of support. Thus, should a President ever choose to submit a § 4(a)(1) report declaring that hostilities had begun or were imminent and requesting immediate authorization for operations necessary to protect American lives and vital national interests, Congress would be profoundly reluctant to accept responsibility for the thwarting of his policy. Indeed, only if the President's policy were subject to severe and legitimate doubt would Congress be likely to resist his request—a valuable function for Congress to perform. But, in any case, a vote would occur: a joint decision would be reached.

Presidents nonetheless have declined to set foot on this playing field under the advice of succesive counselors that to accept the constitutionality of the game would undermine the Presidency itself.[98] Unfortunately, while the device of filing reports "consistent with" the War Powers Resolution has served the purpose of avoiding a head-on confrontation, it has left us fettered to a law that purports to be fundamentally important, but which the President fundamentally flouts.

In dealing with this constitutional impasse, our options today appear three-fold.

The first is to accept the status quo. Chairman Dante Fascell of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, a veteran legislator keenly familiar with the War Powers Resolution in all its aspects, testified that this probably was the most we could hope for.[99] He recognizes the liabilities of the current law, but his pessimism about any practical prospect of enacting improvements leads him to find a silver lining: the War Powers Resolution, whether presidents accept it or not, at least stands in law as a cautionary admonition against presidential excess.

The second option is repeal, or the functional equivalent thereof—as in the current Byrd-Warner proposal,[100] which would establish a formal congressional consultative group to interact with the President in critical situations, but which would denude the law of its principal "joint decision" mechanism: the requirement of congressional authorization. Functional repeal would have the one clear benefit of removing the law itself as a chronic object of dispute each time a use of force occurs. But it would have the distinct and almost unavoidable liability of symbolizing congressional acceptance of the monarchist model now asserted by the Executive.[101] It would return us to the status quo ante, but with a strong presumption that the monarchist model not only had prevailed but had been explicitly accepted by Congress. Since many in Congress are not prepared to accept that model, it would leave Congress and the Executive still at odds on a basic constitutional issue—with the Executive's hand somewhat strengthened.

The third possibility is to legislate a new framework on which Congress and the President can agree, framework that more successfully embodies the "joint decision" concept. This means devising a set of authorities and procedures that both branches accept as constitutional and as desirable in the conduct of American foreign policy. While this possibility requires a convergence of view and a measure of comity that now seem unlikely, one nevertheless can envisage the premises of such a framework and the elements it might comprise.

PREMISES OF A CONSTITUTIONAL COMPROMISE

A new joint decision framework would be built on the premise that the war power is subject to legislation.

The most elegant rationale for this premise was articulated by Professor Louis Henkin and others during the hearings of the Special Subcommittee on War Powers.[102] Under their reasoning, the war power falls into what Justice Jackson, in his famous concurring opinion in the Steel Seizure Case,[103] called "a zone of twilight" in which the President and Congress have concurrent authority.[104] In this zone, Marshall's old rule in Little v. Barreme[105] customarily governs: the President cannot act unless Congress acts; if Congress acts, its legislation supersedes an otherwise valid order of the President.

Other scholars move more directly to the conclusion that the war power is subject to legislative delineation, resting their argument on a straight-forward reading of the Constitution: the power of the Congress to declare war and the mandate to Congress to "make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for the carrying into Execution the foregoing [congressional] Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof."[106] They argue that, except in emergency situations affecting the security of American citizens or the country as a whole—situations which compel the President to act without prior congressional approval—the power to commit troops to combat is subject to congressional control, including any procedures Congress may choose to delineate in law.[107]

Obviously, general acceptance of joint decision framework would entail that the Executive yield the more extravagant constitutional claims made in defense of the monarchist model. But it would require, too, some recognition that the supposed need to unconstrained presidential authority in the modern age, which gave rise to such claims, has been exaggerated, as has the assumed superiority of executive branch sources of "intelligence." In an era when it has become clear that a good journalist's published analysis of events abroad will often prove as sound as highly classified National Intelligence Estimate, the cult of Executive expertise, which enjoyed a long run in the first decades of the postwar period, has surely had its day.

This is not to say that the President should be constrained in any way in protecting the nation during a genuine emergency or that Congress, in situations requiring longer-term judgment, will always contribute Solomonic wisdom to a joint decision. But neither can we assume that the presidency is a repository of flawless geopolitical instinct; history supports no expectation of consistent sagacity in either branch. Whatever its widely advertised foibles, Congress does, by its very nature, represent the broad diversity of America, and its members possess an enormous collective body of experience and common sense as to what works and what does not in the real world of human behavior, at home and abroad. In time of decision on war and peace, Congress' collective response will constitute a threshold test of whether the President's policies can win and sustain needed public support.

A new framework also requires the Executive to recognize that, ultimately, American foreign policy may benefit in use-of-force situations from the smooth workings of an agreed-upon system that yields a prompt congressional response. Motivated by patriotic instinct and sheer politics, Congress will, in almost any reasonable case, support a President's call to arms. And it is all the more likely to support him if the procedure for decision is no longer in dispute. Such a procedure thus can be doubly effective in fostering unanimity: it will force Congress off the sidelines while removing a chronic complaint about process.

IV. OUTLINES OF A NEW "JOINT DECISION" FRAMEWORK

A new "joint decision" framework could involve several elements.

New title

An initial element, more than cosmetically important, would be a new title to the law. After years of contention, the very name "War Powers Resolution" elicits attitudes so conflicting, entrenched, and emotion-charged as virtually to preclude rational debate and the grand compromise necessary for a new framework. Among its liabilities, the existing title invites digressive semantic debates as to what constitutes a war, whereas the real subject at issue is how the United States should decide on a policy that entails the likelihood of extended warfare. The current name also conveys an impression that legislation in this area represents a small-minded congressional effort to prosecute a parochial dispute about "powers," even at the cost of impeding military actions needed for American security.

In truth, the new law's purpose would be essentially that of its predecessor: to provide an effective mechanism, consistent with the Constitution, for joint decision-making on the use of American military power. But this affirmative aim, and the expectation that force will be used where necessary, would be more plainly conveyed by a title such as "The Use of Force Act."

Enumeration of Presidential Authorities

The key element of a new framework would be to move beyond the now sterile dispute over precisely what the Constitution, unembellished by legislation, allows and to accommodate practical reality by enumerating and affirming in law a broad range to soundly conceived presidential authorities. Such authorities would be available to the President without incident-specific congressional action—but, except in emergencies, only for a limited period. This listing would include and subsume those emergency authorities to use force regarded as inherent presidential powers deriving from accepted constitutional practice. And it would include additional authorities that Congress might wish, in the national interest, to grant, such as circumscribed authority to preempt or retaliate against clearly identified acts of terrorism.

It bears emphasis that Congress would not, through this technique, be conceding constitutional authority to the President, but rather exercising its own constitutional power to define and delegate authority. In the War Powers Resolution, enacted in an atmosphere of heated interbranch contention, Congress explicitly sought to confer no authority. Its intention was to rein the President in from assertions of unwarranted authority. In contrast, through a Use of Force Act, Congress would affirmatively delegate authorities that embrace and extend beyond those independently held by the President solely through the Constitution. In doing so, however, Congress would impose standards, limitations, and procedures pursuant to its own constitutional powers.

One authority, clearly not inherent but which Congress might wish to provide, would empower the President to use force pursuant to a decision of the United Nations Security Council[108]—as President Truman did in Korea, with the difference that Truman acted unilaterally, asserting an inherent authority.[109] It seems inconceivable that Congress would wish to thwart the United States' participation in any multilateral use of force on which the Security Council could unanimously agree, particularly if the President had consulted with the congressional leadership before participating in the United Nations' decision. From the President's perspective, genuine consultation would be the essence of prudence, since an extended use of force would eventually require congressional approval. Such a pre-authorization to the President could, in an international emergency such as the Korean intervention, prove useful and would serve, by its very existence, as a symbol of American support for multilateral, consensus-based U.N. action.

A similar authority for multilateral action would empower the President to use force in cooperation with America's democratic allies under circumstances wherein military intervention could have decisive effect in protecting existing democratic institutions in a particular foreign country against a severe and immediate threat. As with the U.N.-related authority, built-in constraints on the President would derive from the need to act multilaterally and the eventual need to obtain congressional authorization for a sustained use of force.

In legislation creating a new framework, all such authorities would be placed under the conceptual heading of "confirming and conferring," so as to avoid an endless dispute over the exact location of the line between what the President already possesses independently and what Congress was bestowing upon him by this legislation. By way of example, this aggregation of authorities could take the following form:

AUTHORITY AND LIMITS

§ 1 (a) In the absence of a declaration of war or statutory authorization for a specific use of force, the President, through powers vested by the Constitution and by this law, is authorized to use force abroad—

(1) to repel an armed attack upon the United States, its territories, or its armed forces;

(2) to respond to a foreign military threat that severely and directly jeopardizes the supreme national interests of the United States under extraordinary emergency conditions that do not permit sufficient time for Congress to consider statutory authorization;

(3) to protect and extricate citizens and nationals of the United States located abroad in situations involving a direct and imminent threat to their lives, provided they are being evacuated as rapidly as possible;

(4) to forestall an imminent act of international terrorism known to be directed at citizens or nationals of the United States, or to retaliate against the perpetrators of a specific act of international terrorism directed at such citizens or nationals;

(5) to protect, through defensive measures and with maximum emphasis on multilateral action, internationally recognized rights of innocent and free passage in the air and on the seas;

(6) to participate in multilateral actions undertaken under urgent circumstances and pursuant to the approval of the United Nations Security Council; and

(7) to participate in multilateral actions undertaken in cooperation with democratic allies under urgent circumstances wherein the use of force could have decisive effect in protecting existing democratic institutions in a particular nation against a severe and immediate threat.

(b) Force may not be used for purposes of aggression, and any and every use of force shall be subject to the principles of necessity and proportionality. Accordingly, force may be used only—

(1) if every effort has been made to achieve the objective set forth in subsection (a) (1)-(7) by means other than the use of force;

(2) with levels of force, in a manner, and for a duration essential to and directly connected with the achievement of such objective; and

(3) if the diplomatic, military, economic, or humanitarian consequences of such action are in reasonable proportion to the benefits of such objective.

Some would doubtless see in the affirmation of such authorities a dangerously excessive congressional concession. Indeed, the authorities listed above would have sanctioned such actions as the initial stages of the Korean intervention (clause 6); the Cuban missile crisis blockade (clause 2); the Iranian hostage rescue attempt (clause 3); the Dominican and Grenada invasions (clause 3, to the extent that evidence of danger to American citizens could be adduced and the limitations of subsection (b) were met); the Libya bombing (clause 4, to the extent that Libyan culpability in terrorism could be adduced); and initiation of the Persian Gulf escort operation (clause 5, to the extent the action could be justified as a defense of free passage).

But while generous in scope, this affirmation of authorities would also define and limit what the President can do and what justifications he can properly use—as opposed to the current monarchist situation in which no limits are even acknowledged.[110] By outlining broad but specific authority, the law also would be constraining: in accord with Marshall's rule in Little v. Bareme, what is not authorized is prohibited.

This approach—explicit authorization entailing implicit constraints—provides a sound constitutional means by which Congress can step usefully into Justice Jackson's "zone of twilight." By granting express authorities it would illuminate, in practical situations, when the President's authority is "at its maximum." Conversely, by implying which measures would be incompatible with the will of Congress, it would clarify those circumstances in which the President's power is "at its lowest ebb."[111] Thus, a Use of Force Act would serve not only to provide standards for evaluating actions already taken, but as a guide for action—an important function of all law.

An obvious concern is that the President could abuse such authorities by presenting a distorted interpretation of events. But the Chief Executive can present his version of events now, and there are no standards against which this portrayal can be weighed. In a functioning joint decision framework, a blatant distortion of authorities or circumstances would entail a clear risk. For such a framework would—except in an emergency directly imperiling the nation—empower the President to use force only in the short-term, and his efforts to obtain congressional approval for sustaining the action would be greatly compromised by a provocative act of misrepresentation.

Clearer definition of use of force

A new law also could more clearly define what kinds of activities are to be "captured" in its mechanism. The essential aim of a joint decision procedure is to ensure that the commitment of U.S. forces to sustained hostilities—to warfare—is based on affirmative congressional action. As a corollary, however, this crucial mechanism should not be triggered by any and all hostilities, including ephemeral incidents over which the President has no control. For example, we emphatically do not want a minor episode caused by a trigger-happy corporal on either side of the Korean DMZ, or by a band of terrorists, to set into motion a mandated decisionmaking process of the entire United States Government.

Our attention belongs primarily on uses of force involving some degree of United States policy initiative, in which American forces are newly deployed, or assigned to new duties, involving extensive combat or its likelihood. Our decision mechanism should go into effect only in the event of a commitment of forces to actual or prospective warfare.

Thus, in the case of forces already on-line abroad, minor episodes, however caused, would not fall within the statute because they involve no United States policy initiative, whereas major warfare resulting from foreign attack would become a "use of force" at the point when defensive measures required a presidential decision to dispatch military reinforcements. This dividing line is appropriate. Our mutual security treaties, under which most American forces are deployed abroad, do not in themselves constitute a presidential authorization to wage war. Rather, they represent an American commitment to participate in the defense of foreign nations via the constitutional decisionmaking process of the United States Government.[112]

As a practical matter, of course, basing American forces abroad places them intentionally at risk and constitutes a circumstantial commitment undertaken by the entire government from which may be inferred an expectation that the United States will bring in additional defensive means as necessitated by enemy attack. But when defensive action abroad is transformed into sustained warfare, an authorizing act should be performed, both as a constitutional requirement and as a necessary means of galvanizing the nation behind a policy that will entail sacrifice and demand unity.

In current law a use of force requiring eventual congressional authorization is defined simply: the introduction of United States Armed Forces into "hostilities or situations where imminent involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances."[113] Unfortunately, the ambiguities surrounding the concept of "hostilities" are similar to those raised by the term "war," and the meaning of "clearly indicated by the circumstances" is equally subject to debate and obfuscation. Thus, during recent operations in the Persian Gulf, even after American naval forces aboard the USS Stark had been killed, even after American naval vessels had hit Iranian mines, even after U.S. forces had undertaken attacks against Iranian facilities—and indeed even after then Vice-President Bush had criticized Iran for permitting its ill-fated civilian airliner to fly "over a [U.S.] warship engaged in battle"[114]—the Reagan administration was unwilling to acknowledge that the United States Navy had been involved in actions requiring a report under §4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution.

No definition can ever fully escape susceptibility to quibbling, but a new framework might employ a more complete definition, along the following lines:

Definition

§2. The term "use of force" means the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or potential hostilities. Such action refers to situations where United States Armed Forces—

(i) have recently been introduced into the territory of a nation, or deployed to expand significantly the United States military presence in such territory, or committed to new activities in such territory or on the high seas; and

(ii) are operating with a substantial likelihood of inflicting or occurring casualties, or have inflicted or incurred casualties.

This somewhat more refined definition could avoid some of the confusion that has surrounded the phrasing in the current law and would serve the useful purpose of making clear that the mechanism is not intended to be triggered by an isolated incident involving U.S. forces already deployed in established roles. More important, it would make clear that the mechanism would indeed be triggered by combat activities involving U.S. forces in new or expanded roles emanating from presidential decision.

Consultation

A critical question is whether and how Executive-Legislative consultation might be improved. Consultation does not, of course, guarantee agreement or even comity. But genuine consultation, meaning a timely exchange of information and advice, should be considered the norm and a functioning joint decision law should aim to foster that process.

The Byrd-Warner bill would seek to do so—indeed it implicity places all of its antimonarchist hopes in this basket—by specifying an eighteen-member congressional consultative group and requiring the President to interact with it in use-of-force situations. This is a useful measure, if for no other reason than to deprive the Executive of the long-abused excuse that Congress is so large that it is impossible to know with whom to consult. But a designated consultative group will prove hapless if future Presidents continue to view "consultation" as a matter of informing Congress at the last minute, rather than of soliciting the counsel of congressional leaders and acting on the basis of that consultation.

Because it depends on a certain habit of mind and behavior, genuine consultation is unlikely to occur spontaneously in crisis situations. Rather, it requires cultivation through regular Executive-Legislative interaction. Unfortunately, the trend in recent years has been the opposite. While the sunshine legislation of the 1970s served to open Congress to public scrutiny, it also, in the context of the television age, helped to convert hearings into theater, in which departmental secretaries and members of Congress most often speak with the larger audience in mind. Closed "executive" sessions, which once provided a regular venue for frank talk and the cultivation of personal familiarity, are now used almost exclusively for briefings, often by middle-level bureaucrats.

A new joint decision law, in addition to designating a congressional consultative group, could seek to counter the depersonalization of Executive-Legislative relations by institutionalizing regular, closed-door consultative sessions between key administration officials and their oversight committees, as follows:

Consultation

§ 3. (a) Except in the event of an extreme national emergency, the President shall seek the advice and counsel of the Congress prior to the use of force.

(b)(1) To facilitate consultation between Congress and the President on foreign and national security policy, when Congress is in session the following meetings shall occur as a regular practice, in open or closed session and with exceptions as agreed by the parties:

(A) the Secretary of State shall meet monthly with the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives;

(B) the Secretary of Defense shall meet monthly with the Committee on Armed Services of the Senate and the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives;

(C) the Director of Central Intelligence shall meet monthly with the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives;

(D) the President's National Security Adviser shall meet monthly with the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the House Majority Leader, the House Minority leader, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Senate Majority Leader, and the Senate Minority Leader; and

(E) the President shall meet at least once every three months with a Congressional Leadership Group, on which the Speaker of the House of Representatives shall serve as Chairman and which shall comprise the Members referred to in paragraph (D) and the chairmen and ranking minority members of the committees named in paragraphs (A), (B), and (C).

(2) Such consultation shall have, among its primary purposes—

(A) identifying potential situations in which the use of force might be necessary and examining thoroughly the wisdom and lawfulness of such use; and

(B) in those instances in which a use of force has already been undertaken, discussing how such use of force complies with the provisions of subsection 1(b).

(3) To facilitate consultation under unusual circumstances, the President shall meet promptly with the Congressional Leadership Group on his own initiative or upon receipt of a special request from its chairman, who shall issue such special request pursuant to a request from a majority of the members of the Group.

A time frame for joint decision

Retention of some stipulated time frame would seem an unavoidable element of any joint decision mechanism for the simple reason that without a time period—a defined point by which affirmative congressional participation in the "joint decision" is necessary—the requirement for such participation would have no meaning. To underscore the decisiveness of the clock, the law should specifically invoke Congress' most unquestioned power—the power of the purse—by providing that, in the absence of congressional action, the President's authority to expend funds expires after the time allowed.[115]

An extension of the time clock from the current 60/90 days to, say, 120 days would provide more flexibility to both the President and the Congress, while mitigating any appearance that the President was on a short leash. But if the joint decision mechanism contains no deadline, we are back to the monarchist model in which the President essentially can do as he pleases and Congress must reach for the purse strings as its only recourse.

Clearly, retaining a time clock, the most vehemently attacked element of the current War Powers Resolultion, presents the critically problematic aspect of any compromise. But the constitutionality of such a mechanism, governing nonemergency situations, seems beyond doubt.[116] And the practical case against it is hardly as substantive as many have come to believe. The basic charge, that it has proven "unworkable," is simple disingenuous; the clock mechanism will work—and produce a timely vote—if Presidents accept the procedures envisaged by the law. That vote, moreover, can come at virtually any time the President wants it; if he wants it early, his congressional supporters can produce that result. Thus, the idea that American foreign policy will be suspended in uncertainty throughout the time-clock period[117] is as groundless as the specter of withdrawal through congressional inaction.

A time-clock provision also faces the charge that it may provide leverage to an adversary of the United States: if he can make a conflict painful enough in the short run, perhaps he can induce timidity in the Congress. But this is an exaggerated concern. With or without a war powers law, United States willingness to undertake sustained hostilities will be subject to democratic pressures; a statutory mechanism is simply a means of delineating procedure. Moreover, as a practical matter, an enemy tactic designed to intimidate by inflicting casualties on American forces in large numbers would more likely backfire and solidify congressional support of the President and American troops in the field.

The truth is that, in suggesting such liabilities, opponents of the time clock are expressing not so much a practical concern as a constitutional attitude. In the words of Professor John Hart Ely, they are "not simply against establishing a clock, but against enforcing the Constitution generally: an inevitable byproduct of any sort of constitutional requirement of congressional approval is that the enemy also will know that approval is required. The only way around this is to make the President a dictator, but that wasn't, and shouldn't be, the idea."[118]

As an alternative to a numerically defined time clock—e.g., 120 days—a Use of Force Act could employ a descriptive formulation designed to embody the concept of the point at which hostilities become sustained. The numerical specification, after all, is simply an attempt to establish a reasonable dividing line between an "incident" and a conflict describable as "war." If, in the effort to negotiate a grand compromise, the time clock became an insuperable obstacle, a descriptive approach could be tried. But such a formulation must be decisively descriptive. And if the concern is to avoid rigidity—meaning the danger that a time clock could somehow hamstring the United States at a crucial moment—the direct antidote would be explicit "escapes" from the time-clock constraint.

Exceptions to the time clock

While a time clock, whether numerical or descriptive, is necessary to establish the imperative of congressional participation in a joint decision to engage U.S. forces in sustained hostilities, two types of exceptions are warranted.

The first derives from constitutional considerations and logic. Since a use of force based on an inherent presidential power—the famous example is repelling an attack on the United States—could, at least conceivably, extend beyond the limited time frame, the mechanism should provide for the possibility. If it does not, a Use of Force Act will, like the War Powers Resolution, face the charge that it aims to constrain what the Constitution permits.[119]

This charge can be preempted straightforwardly—by providing for a presidential certification to Congress, accompanied by detailed explanation, that he has determined in a particular incident that supreme national interests are so imperiled as to constitute an emergency requiring that he exceed the limit stipulated in the law. This would, almost by definition, satisfy constitutional concerns because the basis for any assertion of presidential warmaking power is emergency; to allow the President to invoke emergency is to leave unconstrained any "independent" power conferred by the Constitution.

Those suspicious of the Executive will undoubtedly view this as an irresistible invitation to presidential subterfuge: a truck-sized loophole. It therefore bears reemphasis that the principal aim of this new law would be to move off the dead center of stalemate—and de facto monarchist practice—by engaging the Executive and the Congress as partners in a process wherein the President's actions are weighed, first by him and then by Congress, against agreed standards. The law would establish a powerful norm: that when the United States engages in hostilities beyond a certain duration, it must—except in dire national emergency—be based on affirmative congressional action.

Thus, any President using this "loophole" would have to marshal and submit arguments, and face the political response. To help ensure the President's sobriety in drawing upon this provision, the new law could provide expedited procedures for a congressional resolution expressing disagreement with the President's rationale. While this type of resolution would have no direct legal effect unless Congress had the strength to override the President's veto, passage of such a resolution, even by only a majority vote in each house, would express the President's loss of congressional, and presumably public, confidence. It could also have judicial significance by adding ripeness to a situational dispute between the branches—a dispute of a kind that the new law would invite the courts to arbitrate, through provisions discussed below.

A a guard against prolonged presidential abuse of the "emergency escape," the new statute could provide that the certification of emergency permits the continuation of a use of force for only thirty legislative days unless Congress, by joint resolution affirmatively accepts the President's rationale.[120]

This limitation could subject the statute to the Ervin-style charge that it seeks unconstitutionally to limit the President's inherent authority to deal with emergencies. But it is difficult to contend that the President possesses a constitutional authority to deal with extended emergencies of a kind that he cannot persuade Congress to acknowledge.

A second means of presidential escape from the automaticity of the time clock would be a stipulation designed to reassure all those who might continue to worry over the specter of troop withdrawal by congressional inaction. Such a provision would state that the time clock would not apply if either or both of the two houses had failed to vote on a specific presidential request for authorization to undertake or sustain hostilities. In truth, expedited procedures would render this eventuality almost totally theoretical. But by providing an explicit remedy for the possibility that a timid or inept Congress could avoid its responsibilities, this stipulation would lay to rest, once and for all, the principal argument employed against the current law. Even while protecting against a virtually impossible event, it would underscore and symbolize the seriousness of congressional intent underlying the new law.

Reporting and expediting procedures

A new joint decision law would retain two other features of the War Powers Resolution: the requirement of a prompt presidential report and expedited procedures for legislation affecting a use of force. But certain adjustments are in order.

Under a new law, only one kind of report should be required—a use of force report—in order to eliminate the ambiguities that have plagued reports under the War Powers Resolution. This report would include the particular authority within § 1(a) under which the President had acted and a detailed explanation of how the limitations of § 1(b) had been, and were being, heeded. The new law would also underscore a feature of current law too little understood: that the clock mechanism is triggered by the events that require the report, not by the report itself. The latter provision would not eliminate the possibility of confusion in a particular instance in which a President refused to submit a report: is the clock running or isn't it? But it would end the current conceptual confusion in which most participants in the process believe that the clock does not run until the President has submitted a report or Congress has passed a specific law starting it.

Expedited procedures under a new law should be similar to those under the War Powers Resolution, with one exception relating to sponsorship. Although existing procedures have never been used, they appear to be subject to operational confusion because they give top legislative priority to any bill purporting to authorize or limit any use of force. This raises the possibility that many bills will be in play at one point, and also that a single Member of Congress may become a nuisance. The Byrd-Warner bill would overcome this possibility by according expedited treatment only to bills emanating from an elite leadership group. A more democratic means to the same end, however, would be a provision that facilitated action on any bill authorizing or limiting a use of force under two conditions: first, as indicated earlier, if it were introduced pursuant to a presidential request; second, if the measure had "substantial sponsorship"—a threshold percentage, say twenty-five percent, of the members of that chamber. This would guard against parliamentary pitfalls while ensuring action in response to the President and on any other measure on which there was some considerable will for action.

Expedited procedures could also be accorded any "substantially sponsored" bill designed to make a finding that the clock, in a particular circumstance, was indeed running. To satisfy the constitutional requirements of the presentment clause, this measure would have to go to the President for signature and would accordingly face a difficult test of passage since a President who had tried to avoid the clock by refusing to submit a report could be expected to veto a measure affirming its applicability. But even if Congress could not override the President's veto, such a measure would nonetheless be a valuable vehicle of congressional expression, and a presidential veto in this context would be an act of notable political, and possibly judicial, significance.

Inviting judicial review

While enactment of a new joint decision law would overcome the current constitutional impasse, the new law would provide only a high degree of protection—not a guarantee—against an Executive-Legislative impasse with regard to a specific future use of force. For even though a revised mechanism could only be enacted in spirit of cooperation between Congress and the President, a future President could decline, whether for reasons of honest disagreement or bad faith, to submit a use-of-force report deemed by many in Congress to be required by the circumstances. We would then find ourselves facing the new-familiar situation in which the clock was running, but only in the abstract, and the President was protected in pursuing his policy through the minimal support of one-third-plus-one in either house. An interbranch dispute could also arise if the President continued to use force beyond the time allowed; for example, in an extended "emergency" that Congress refused to acknowledge. In such circumstance, the courts could play a useful role by rendering a decision that would formally determine the application of law to the situation in dispute.

Unfortunately, most recently in Lowry v. Reagan,[121] the courts have shied away from such a role, for reasons relating to the so-called "political question" and "equitable discretion" doctrines. It is not necessary here to evaluate in detail those arguments for judicial abstention,[122] except to say that they have been far too broadly applied.

What bears emphasis is that the courts, in rendering a decision in any such litigation, would not be deciding whether the United States should continue in a particular use of force, but only whether defined circumstances existed such that Congress should decide. Far from being beyond the courts' competence, as is sometimes argued, this is the way our judicial system customarily functions; the courts take testimony concerning the facts and then weigh those facts against prescribed legal standards.[123]

A new Use of Force law could help to overcome the barrier of judicial diffidence as follows:

Judicial review

§ 4. (a) Any Member of Congress may bring an action in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for declaratory judgment and injunctive relief on the grounds that the provisions of this Act have been violated.

(b) (1) In any action in a court of the United States seeking compliance with the provisions of this Act, the court shall not decline to make a determination on the merits based upon the doctrine of political question, remedial discretion, equitable discretion, or any other finding of nonjusticiability, unless such declination is required by Article III of the Constitution.

(2) Notwithstanding the number, position, or party affiliation of any plaintiffs in an action described in subsection (a) of this section, it is the intent of Congress that the courts infer that Congress would disapprove of any use of force inconsistent with the provisions of this Act and find that an impasse exists between Congress and the Executive which requires judicial resolution.

(c) Any court in which such an action is heard shall accord such action the highest priority and announce its judgment as speedily as the requirements of Article III of the Constitution permit.

(d) If a court funds that a report was required to be submitted under the Act, it shall—

(1) direct the President to submit such a report; or

(2) declare that the time period set forth in the Act has commenced on the date of the court's judgment, or on a previous date determined by the court with due regard to unavoidable military necessity respecting the safety of United States Armed Forces, and shall accordingly expire on a specific date.

(e) A judgment described in subsection (c) of this section shall be directly appealable to the United States Supreme Court.

Should the Supreme Court ever render such a decision, there would seem little doubt, as a practical matter, that Congress and the President would act in conformity. The clock would be unambiguously in effect; Congress would authorize or not authorize within the time allowed; and the President would be required to respond—either to an authorization with or without conditions, or to a funding cutoff. While contentious litigation concerning an ongoing use of force is hardly an appealing prospect, the availability of this recourse would give completeness to the mechanism, and by so doing would encourage presidential participation in the first place.

V. BENEFITS OF NEW FRAMEWORK

Consolidating these and other elements of a possible new framework into a piece of draft legislation has yielded a draft "Use of Force Act" now under discussion within the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Such legislation, undoubtedly requiring further refinement, would repeal and replace the War Powers Resolution, even while retaining some of its characteristics. While one cannot be sanguine about the Bush Administration's receptivity to legislation embodying the joint decision concept, one can say what the trade-offs would be if a new framework were accepted.

For the Executive, a major gain, after long years of dispute, would be a clear affirmation in law of broad authorities to use force in a wide variety of circumstances. These explicitly acknowledged powers, buttressed by a Presidential authority to waive time limitation in emergency circumstances, would serve to eliminate any possible impression of an American Commander in Chief fettered by excessive constraints. Procedurally, the President could also enjoy the benefit of an agreed mechanism of which he could take full advantage in obtaining prompt and explicit congressional support in critical foreign policy situations. And operationally, in circumstances requiring specific authorization for sustained action, he would also gain the flexibility of an extended time clock, although this in practice would tend to be more symbol than reality, since a President would probably want a vote well before the expiration of any time-limited authority.

For Congress, a grand compromise would serve to bring the President, after a prolonged and debilitating dispute, back onto the playing field—to participate, as a matter of agreed principle, in a joint decision mechanism. Having achieved this goal, Congress would surely not always welcome the accompanying requirement: that it stand up and be counted. Congress also would have to deal with the fact that any procedure enabling the President to obtain a quick response from Congress may enable him to maneuver Congress into supplying a rubber stamp. Against that danger, the only congressional defense is a strong dose of prudence in crafting any authorization provided.

But perhaps we can be more sanguine. For if such a framework is adopted the President's perspective will be this: "I now have a considerable amount of unchallenged short-term authority. But I had better use it wisely and well, for if it is necessary for hostilities to be sustained, I must win the support of a majority in each house within the next few months." Thus, the very existence of a joint decision mechanism would encourage prudence on the President's part as well, along with a strong inclination to consult.

Of course, even agreement on such a framework, its establishment in law, and its generalized acceptance cannot deliver us from the burden of choice. We have focused here on how the United States decides on the momentous question of war. What we decide is a matter, ultimately, of judgment. But sound procedure can contribute to wise decision. By resolving the constitutional dispute over the war power, we would liberate our government—both the Executive and Congress—to concentrate in crucial moments on the goals and means of American policy.

We will, in sum, have combined two vital aims. We want the President to have broad authority—and to be so seen by allies and adversaries—to uphold American interests. And we want a system embodying the sound constitutional principle that sustained hostilities should be based on affirmative and specific congressional approval.

With the approach of the 21st Century, Americans can embrace an aspiration that use of force as a tool of foreign policy by all nations will begin to enjoy a well-earned historical rest. But if circumstances do summon United States forces to combat, let us determine that our countrymen are dispatched not in an act of folly, but only when their risk and personal sacrifice are unavoidably necessary, and can be effective, in defending and protecting clearly perceived American interests. That, after all, is the ultimate standard against which any procedure—and any decision to use force—must be judged.

[2] President Ford's report to Congress on the Mayaguez incident reflects his Administration's policy concerning the War Powers Resolution. See infra note 94. The Carter Administration's policy on the Resolution is described infra at note 98.

[3] In assessing the Administration's decision, it bears emphasis that the Gulf nation crucially dependent on export oil by sea is Iran. Iraq and its key Arab allies have enormous pipeline capabilities which enable them to circumvent the Gulf. It was precisely for this reason that Iraq extended its land warfare against Iran into a sea war against Iranian shipping. Had Iraq at any point been willing to desist in the sea war, Iran surely would have done likewise.

Thus, when the United States committed major naval forces in the Gulf, the principal effect was not to assert the right of passage on the seas—nor to protct the "vital oil lifeline to the West" from an Iranian threat—but rather to deploy American power on the Iraqi side of that war. Iraq could now intensify its sea attacks on Iranian shiping with the extra incentive that Iranian retaliation might draw United States forces into active conflict with Iran. The United States Navy had thereby become an adjunct of Iraqi policy.

Obviously, one Administration motive was to regain Arab confidence following the arms-for-hostages fiasco. Another was fear that the Soviets might answer the Kuwaiti reflagging call and thereby gain naval and political access in the Gulf. Still another motivation, though one barely acknowledged, was to do what the policy actually did: place American power behind the Iraqi and Arab cause and thereby help prevent an Iranian victory, which could spread instability throughout the region.

This mosaic of motives, however, was filled with questions. How necessary was it to "reassure" the Arabs, notwithstanding the arms-for-hostages mistake? Specifically, how likely, given their deep-seated antipathy to Communism, was the Kuwaitis' threatened embrace of the Soviet Navy? How serious was the propsect of Iranian victory, and how destablizing would have been the regional consequences? Meanwhile, and most important, what was the likelihood that the United States would be drawn into direct war with Iran, and what would have been the consequences of that?

Although these questions had not been thoroughly considered either by the Executive or the Congress, the United States had undertaken what, according to one prominent commentator, was "by its nature an open-ended commitment in the Gulf" under circumstances in which "America's justification [was] not consistent with its actions—a sure course for domestic discord when the going gets tough down the road." Albert (Peter) Lakeland, the former Senate staff aide most directly involved in the Resolution's 1973 enactment, provided a contrasting view of the origins of the law:

"The principal sponsors of the War Powers Act were Senators [Jacob] Javits and [Armed Services Committee Chairman John] Stennis, . . . hardly members of the "Woodstock generation," as some would imply today. They were, rather, unabashed patriots and life-long proponents of American strength and world leadership. They had always in their minds the crucial importance to America of a strong and successful Presidency.

". . . They were determined to enact a statutory framework to both induce and facilitate a functioning partnership between the President and the Congress as a sine qua non of U.S. national effectivenss in a dangerous world . . . .

"[The] idea that the War Powers Act was some hasty and ill-conceived measure directed at the ongoing Vietnam war . . . is wrong on all counts. The dwindling Vietnam war was specifically exempted from the Act's provisions, and many of the leading supporters of the Vietnam War . . . were staunch proponents of the Act. The overwhelming votes in the Senate and in the House included a number of Members of both Houses who went down the line on the Vietnam War." Id. at 107 (testimony of Albert (Peter) Lakeland).

[10] For a valuable discussion of the various approaches the Supreme Court has used in defining constitutional power—textual, intentionalist, and adaptivist—see Glennon, The Use of Custom in Resolving Separation of Powers Disputes, 64 B.U.L. REV. 109, 111-24 (1984):

"None of the three approaches is . . . capable of meeting reasonable objections leveled against its use as an exclusive methodology. The pure textualist approach proceeds from the fiction that the language of the Constitution alone is dispositive; in contentious circumstances it is not. On the other hand, the adaptavist approach prefers a Constitution that is all sail, threatening the very purpose of a written Constitution, while the intentionalist approach opts for a charter that is all anchor, presupposing a rigid constitutional order not subject to modification.

"The Court has apparently recognized the shortcomings of sole reliance on any one of the three approaches, and has therefore generally employed a combination of approaches. First, it seeks to resolve the controversy by reference to the constitutional text. If the text is not found to be dispositive, the Court will look to the intent of the Framers and to custom and practice. When the Court moves beyond the text, it is seeking to find a fact that it will treat as the equivalent of a textual provision of the Constitution. . . . The occurrence of this fact-finding procedure is implicitly recognized through the frequent reliance upon historical precedent, as well as evidence of the Framers' intent . . . .

". . . The Court has shifted from one approach to another, or emphasized one while deemphasizing another, without articulating any principled basis for favoring the approach selected." Id. at 122-23 (citations omitted).

[30] Id. It should be noted that Alexander Hamilton severely criticized Jefferson for constitutional timidity during this episode. But even Hamilton's own constitutional assertion was a limited one. Tripoli had attacked American naval vessels, and Hamilton believed that the President possessed the power to respond without congressional authorization. However, Hamilton's statements during the war with Tripoli cannot reasonably be read as urging a new war-initiating power for the President which would be out of harmony with the basic principles underlying the constitutional separation of powers. Hamilton asked only that the President interpret his right to repel attacks on American military forces as meaning that he could take all necessary action to eliminate the military threat which the enemy posed even before Congress acted.

Modern day monarchists are prone to invoke the Monroe Doctrine as symbolic of the robust approach to foreign policy that they associate with untrammeled presidential power to use force. But at the time of the Monroe Doctrine's promulgation, Secretary Adams had stated clearly that even if an outright attack were launched by a European power against a South American republic, the Executive's position would be that "the power to determine our resistance is in Congress." [39] Quoted in id. at 57.

[40] A. SCHLESINGER, PRESIDENCY, supra note 12, at 59.

[41] Lincoln's action did, however, rekindle the debate first waged between Jefferson and Hamilton over the constitutional limits governing presidential power to repel attacks on American forces. See supra note 30. "To Jefferson, only defensive action was authorized by the Constitution in the absence of Congressional approval; to Hamilton, the Chief Executive could unilaterally order appropriate offensive action to eliminate any clear danger that similar attacks might recur." Curzan testimony, supra note 30, at 159.

Curzan provides a brief history of Lincoln's actions and the Supreme Court's responses:

After the secession of various Southern states and the attack on Fort Sumter, President Lincoln took a number of steps to defend the Union. Among these was the issuance of an order blockading various Southern ports. Thereafter, Lincoln sought Congressional authorization for his orders and received it. However, during the period of time following the proclamation of a blockade but prior to Congressional ratification, several Southern ships were seized. The legality of the seizure was challenged and this challenge, of course, brought the legality of the presidentially imposed blockade into question.

The Supreme Court in the Prize Cases, 67 U.S. (2 Black) 635 (1862), split 5 to 4 on the issue, with the majority opinion reflecting Hamilton's position and the minority opinion adopting Jefferson's reasoning. Interestingly enough, in light of the weight which many proponents of Presidential power have placed on this case, it should be recognized that the majority of the Court took precautions to place its holding in context and to assert that no major changes in constitutional theory were being proposed. Thus, the opinion noted that the President had "no power to initiate or delcare a war against a foreign nation or a domestic state." But once a war had been declared on the United States, the President had to determine "the shape" of the conflict and decide upon the "degree of force the crisis demand[ed]." Certainly, this doctrine did not mean that the response could be completely out of proportion to the attack or that ex post facto Congressional ratification should not be sought. What it did mean was that when the viability of the nation's political structure was under military challenge, the President should have power to respond through ordering at least a blockade of the attacker's ports. Id. at 159–61.

[50] One Supreme court decision of this period, United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304 (1936), has been frequently portrayed as a landmark case upholding very broad presidential power in foreign affairs. In Curtiss-Wright, the Court did voice certain positions tending to affirm inherent, independent presidential authority in foreign affairs: e.g., "the power of external sovereignty did not depend upon the affirmative grants of the Constitution," id. at 318, and "participation [by Congress] in the exercise of the power is significantly limited," id. at 319. But while these ruminations are often cited by modern-day monarchists (most recently by Lt. Col. Oliver North during the 1987 Iran-Contra hearings), they were obiter dicta—not integral to the Court's holding. Indeed, the decision itself affirmed no more than the President's power to impose an embargo on United States shipping to a foreign country pursuant to a congressional authorization to do so, hardly a monarchist precedent.

[65] Id.; see The Korean Situation: Its Significance to the People of the United States, 23 DEP'T ST. BULL. 163–69 (1950). As Professor Schlesinger describes it:

"At a new meeting with congressional leaders, Senator H. Alexander Smith of New Jersey suggested that the President request a joint resolution approving his action. Truman said he would consider this and instructed [Secretary of State] Acheson to prepare a recommendation on it. In the meantime, the debate spilled over to the Senate. Kenneth Wherry of Nebraska said that the President should not have acted without congressional authorization, adding that there was no doubt he would have obtained it. * * *

"This was a fateful moment. Truman had evidently not yet fully made up his mind about the scope of presidential authority. Nor did he pretend to legal skills. But he had a most eminent lawyer at his right hand. His Secretary of State had been law clerk for Justice Brandeis. * * * On July 3 Acheson recommended that Truman not ask for a resolution but instead rely on his constitutional powers as President and Commander-in-Chief. On the same day the State Department churned out a memorandum listing 87 instances * * * in which Presidents had sent American forces into combat on their own intitiative. Truman, impressed by the appearance of precedent and concerned not to squander the power of his office, accepted his Secretary of State's recommendation."

[66] Id. at 132.

[67] A nearly lone voice of concern and consistency was that of the Senate Republican leader, Robert A. Taft ("Mr. Republican"). Several months later, when Truman indicated his intent to send four divisions of U.S. forces to Europe without congressional authorization, Taft initiated what came to be known as the "great debate" over the President's authority to deploy American troops abroad. In a formal speech to the Senate, Taft argued that, while he would have supported a joint resolution providing the necessary authority for the Korean intervention, the President had instead "simply usurped authority, in violation of the laws, and the Constitution, when he sent troops to Korea to carry out the resolution of the United Nations in an undeclared war." Former Senator Taft Speaks on Foreign Policy, 117 CONG. [68] Fulbright Foreword, supra note 56.

[69] Elected to the Senate in 1944, J. William Fulbright became chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1959, and remained loyal to the monarchist concept into the mid 1960s. Monarchism, of course, was not labeled as such; rather, it was then the quintessential "liberal" approach to foreign policy—a defense of the prerogatives of the Executive, who was assumed to have a sophisticated approach to foreign affairs, as against the provincial perspective imputed to the conservatives who dominated Congress. Once Fulbright's disillusion with the Dominican intervention and the Vietnam War had undercut his faith in Executive wisdom, the final decade of his chairmanship—from 1965 to 1975—was characterized by a concerted effort to restore a balance in Executive-Legislative control over American foreign policy. See, e.g., J.W. FULBRIGHT, THE ARROGANCE OF POWER (1966); Fulbright, The Decline—and Possible Fall—of Constitutional Democracy in America, 117 CONG. REC. 10,355 (1971).

[70] In 1951, Professor Schlesinger, supported the Truman Administration, labeled as "demonstrably irresponsible" Senator Taft's criticism of unauthorized military actions by the President. Letter to the New York Times, Jan. 14, 1951. For supplying a gloss of historical and constitutional legitimacy to untrammeled Executive use of force, he and Professor Henry Steele Commager were dubbed "high-flying prerogative men" by the redoubtable historian Professor Edward Corwin. Schlesinger, Policy, supra note 12 at 96. Subseqently, the views of Schlesinger and Commager followed a path of reversal similar to that of Senator Fulbright. See, e.g., Special Subcommittee Hearings, supra note 6 (testimony of Professor Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.); War Powers Legislation Hearings 1972: Hearings on the War Powers Act Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 92d Cong., 1st Sess. 7-71 (1972) (testimony of Henry Steele Commager).

[74] Joint Resolution to Promote the Maintenance of International Peace and Security in Southeast Asia, H.R.J. Res. 1145, Pub. L. No. 88-408, 78 Stat. 384 (1964). As described by Professor Schlesinger:

"After the alleged attacks on American destroyers off the coast of North Vietnam, Johnson called in the congressional leaders. Reminding himself, and them, of Taft's criticism of Truman for not seeking congressional ratification of the Korea decision, he asked their judgment about getting something this time that, as he cautiously put it, 'would give us the opinion of Congress.' The leaders thought it a fine idea, and the administration pulled out a draft resolution, prepared months before and awaiting the occasion."

A. SCHLESINGER, PRESIDENCY, supra note 12, at 179.

Later the Senate Foreign Relations Committee would conduct an extensive inquiry into the Tonkin Gulf episode. The Gulf of Tonkin, the 1964 Incidents (Parts I and II): Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 90th Cong., 2d Sess. (1968).

By 1970, the Committee had concluded that Congress was confronted in August 1964 with a situation that was described to it as urgent, requiring prompt acquiescence in an expedient that seemed likely to meet the needs of the moment, of which the foremost—or so we allowed ourselves to be persuaded—was a resounding expression of national unity at a moment when it was believed that the country had been attacked.

. . . It has since been established that the [two American vessels attacked] were engaged in intelligence activities in the Gulf of Tonkin, a fact that was not vouchsafed to Congress when it considered the resolution. In addition, considerable doubt has been raised as to the exact circumstances of the alleged second attack on the two vessels, most particularly as to whether this attack occurred at all, and, if it did, whether the administration had proof of it at the time that it ordered its retaliatory air strike on August 4, 1964.

SENATE COMM. ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, TERMINATION OF MIDDLE EAST AND SOUTHEAST ASIA RESOLUTIONS, S. REP. No. 834, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 9-10 (1970) [hereinafter TERMINATION REPORT].

[75] Johnson's Under Secretary of State, former Attorney General Nicholas Katzenbach, testified that the Resolution constituted the "functional equivalent" of a declaration of war. But Katzenbach did not mean this assertion to entail the proposition that any such declaration was required. With or without the Resolution, Katzenbach further asserted, the President possessed the constitutional authority to carry on the war. U.S. Commitments to Foreign Powers: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 90th Cong., 1st Sess., 83, 141 (1967).

President Johnson himself took full advantage of this straddle, extracting the political benefit of what arguably was an authorization while maintaining that any such authorization was unnecessary. "Though it amused him to taunt members of Congress by pulling the Tonkin Gulf resolution out of his pocket and flourishing it as proof that Congress had authorized the escalation of American involvement, he did not believe for a moment that the resolution provided the legal basis for his action." A. SCHLESINGER, PRESIDENCY, supra note 12, at 181.

For its part, stung by revelations about the events that precipitated the Gulf of Tonkin Resolution and increasingly concerned by the war's intensification, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee sought to discount the Resolution's significance as an authorization:

Often referred to loosely as an act of congressional authorization for the President to commit the United States to full scale war in Vietnam if he saw fit, the Gulf of Tonkin resolution is in fact not an authorization at all. The resolution says nothing about authorizing or empowering anybody to do anything. . . .

. . . In this respect, the distinction between an expression of approval and a grant of authority would seem to be of critical importance.

TERMINATION REPORT, supra note 74, at 9 (emphasis in original).

Such fine distinctions notwithstanding, the Resolution's language was sweeping: "Congress approves and supports the determination of the President . . . to take all necessary measures to . . . prevent further aggression" and the United States is "prepared, as the President determines, to take all necessary steps, including the use of armed force" to assist South Vietnam.

The Resolution was repealed in 1971, but by then the Executive, under Richard Nixon, brooked no challenge to the Commander in Chief's authority.

[76] "We are in a position in the world today where the argument as to who has the power to do this, that, or the other thing, is not exactly what is called for from America in this very critical hour." SENATE COMM. ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, NATIONAL COMMITMENTS REPORT, S. REP. No. 797, 90th Cong., 1st Sess. 17 (1976).

[77] Typical was this assertion, issued by the Nixon Administration some months prior to the Cambodian invasion in response to a pending congressional resolution:

As Commander in Chief, the President has the sole authority to command our Armed Forces, whether they are within or outside the United States. And, although reasonable men may differ as to the circumstances in which he should do so, the President has the constitutional power to send U.S. military forces abroad without specific congressional approval.

Quoted in TERMINATION REPORT, supra note 74, at 7.

[78] See generally 1973 U.S. CODE CONG. & ADMIN. NEWS 2346.

[79] Section 5(b) specifies a 60-day period but allows a 30-day extension "if the President determines and certifies to the Congress in writing that unavoidable military necessity requires the continued use of such armed forces in the course of bringing about a prompt removal of such forces." War Power Resolution § 5(b), 50 U.S.C. § 1544(b). Because the time clock commences when the report is due (i.e., within 48 hours after commencement of the action), the actual period before authorization is required is 62/92 days. The Resolution's clock is intended to tick even if no report is sent. But, as discussed below, the lack of a report creates a crucial ambiguity as to whether one was in fact due.

[80] Although the term "withdrawal" is commonly used in discussing the War Powers Resolution, section 5(b) actually requires that "the President shall terminate any use of United States Armed Forces with respect to which a report was submitted (or required to be submitted)." Id. (emphasis added).

[81] Concurrent resolutions do not require the President's signature.

[83] Special Subcommittee Hearings, supra note 6, at 765 (testimony of Professor Henkin).

[84] Indeed, § 8(d) of the Resolution states this specifically:

Nothing in this joint resolution—

(1) is intended to alter the constitutional authority of the Congress or of the President, or the provisions of existing treaties; or

(2) shall be construed as granting any authority to the President with respect to the introduction of United States Armed Forces into hostilities or into situations wherein involvement in hostilities is clearly indicated by the circumstances which authority he would not have had in the absence of this joint resolution. 50 U.S.C. § 1547(d).

[85] In voting against the Resolution Senator Eagleton stated: "I wish to say . . . that I do not view this as a historic recapture [of congressional authority]; on the contrary I view it as a historic surrender." 119 CONG. REC. 36,189 (1973).

This danger is exemplified by the construction given the War Powers Resolution by some scholars defending its constitutionality. These scholars view the Resolution as a sort of "sunset law," the functional equivalent of a statute requiring that troops may not be committed for more than 60/90 days. See Carter, The Constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution, 70 VA. L. REV. 101, 133 (1984). But in so doing, such defenders of the Resolution may concede more than they would wish, since it seems inherent in the very concept of a "sunset law" that what is being constrained temporarily is an authority, not an act of illegality.

In fact, section 5(c) does not appear to be unconstitutional. Even assuming that Chadha makes sense, it seems distinguishable. . . . Section 5(c) does not fit the profile of a standard "legislative veto" wherein Congress has delegated certain powers to the executive branch and then attempted to pull them back by reserving a right to veto executive exercises of the delegation. Instead, it should be read in the context of sections 4(a)(1) and 5(b), as part of a package attempting in concrete terms to approximate the accommodation reached by the Constitution's framers, that the President could act militarily in an emergency but was obligated to cease and desist in the event Congress did not approve as soon as it had a reasonable opportunity to do so. Id. (emphasis in original; footnote omitted); see also Vance, Striking the Balance: Congress and the President Under the War Powers Resolution, 133 U. [90] Ely, supra note 89, at 1397.

[91] War Powers Resolution § 4(a), 50 U.S.C. § 1543(a) (1982).

[92] It is sometimes suggested that Congress could, if it simply had the will, adopt a resolution triggering the clock through a finding that a report was "required to be submitted." But a concurrent resolution would have no legal effect for presentment clause reasons, whereas a joint resolution (which has the status of law) probably would require a two-thirds vote in each house because any President, having refused to submit the report in the first place, presumably would veto it. Thus, any such attempt to "enforce" the War Powers Resolution would represent a reversion to the monarchist model in which the President is unrestrained until Congress can overwhelm him.

Indeed, to speak of "enforcing" the War Powers Resolution using two-thirds majorities to oppose the President reflects a loss of orientation. The purpose of the War Powers Resolution is to delineate procedures embodying the principle that warfare, except in limited emergency situations, should be based on affirmative congressional action taken through simple majorities in the two houses.

[93] Professor Ely has summarized this phenomenon:

Repeatedly—as in the last stages of the war in IndoChina, the attempt to free our hostages in Iran, and in Lebanon, Central America, Grenada, and Tripoli—the President either has not reported under section 4(a) or has failed to specify that what he is filing is a section 4(a)(1) "hostilities" report, thus avoiding the 60-day clock. Congress has responded to this evasion only once, in connection with the Lebanon crisis, when after much hemming and hawing it negotiated a "compromise" recognizing the applicability of the War Powers Resolution (which recognition President Reagan immediately repudiated) and extending the period the troops could remain in Lebanon for 18 months. Ely, supra note 89, at 1381.

President Ford's report to Congress was submitted "[i]n accordance with my desire that the Congress be informed on this matter and taking note of Section 4(a)(1) of the War Powers Resolution." Id. In it, President Ford took the opportunity to assert that his use of military force to free the merchant marine vessel and crew seized by Cambodian forces in international waters "was ordered and conducted pursuant to the President's constitutional Executive power and his authority as Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armed Forces." Id.

This is why the no-fault formula in the War Powers Resolution, wherein no Member of Congress is required to stand up and be counted is unacceptable.").

[97] T. BAILEY, PRESIDENTIAL GREATNESS 227 (1966), quoted in TERMINATION REPORT, supra note 74, at 8. In posing such a question, the Foreign Relations Committee reflected the revolution in the views of its Chairman, J. William Fulbright, who has suggested, in the late-1950s article quoted earlier, see supra note 73, that the defense of democracy might require some compromise of its procedures, but who now had this to say:

"The values of democracy are in large part the processes of democracy. . . . When the exigencies of foreign policy are thought to necessitate the suspension of these processes, repeatedly and over a long period of time, such a foreign policy is not only inefficient but utterly irrational and self-crippling."

J.W. FULBRIGHT, THE CRIPPLED GIANT 208 (1972).

[98] It bears emphasis that the Carter Administration's position on the War Powers Resolution was never fully voiced or tested. Instead, that Administration adopted the conciliatory approach of praising the Resolution's consultation and reporting requirements while agreeing to abide by the constitutionally controversial provisions of § 5 "as a matter of policy" so as to avoid a "prolonged debate over elusive constitutional issues." See War Powers Review, supra note 30, at 190 (testimony of Herbert Hansell, Legal Adviser, Department of State). Hansell went on to describe the Carter Administration's acceptance of the War Power Resolution's basic concept of joint decisionmaking:

As section 2(a) suggests, Congress intended the Resolution as a remedial measure to insure that decisions to commit United States Armed Forces to Hostilities should involve "the collective judgment of both the Congress and the President."

This Administration is of the view that, as a matter of constitutional law and public policy, this country should not go to war without that collective judgment. Id. at 188.

Hansell's 1977 testimony gave rise to some optimism that the war powers issue might have been in large measure resolved. See id. at 191 (statement of Sen. Javits) ("I am delighted [that] . . . [w]e are now faced with the problem of the trees, not the forest."). But Senator Dick Clark expressed concern that a future Administration could easily adopt a different "policy" toward the Resolution, and that this would be all the easier because of the Carter Administration's unwillingness to adopt a formal position accepting the Resolution's constitutionality. Id. at 210 (statement of Sen. Clark). Hansell responded by expressing the Carter Administration's belief that "a much more important and effective restraint . . . on future administrations would be to develop a body of practice, of performances." Id. (Hansell testimony).

As it turned out, Senator Clark's concern was prescient. Because its only use of force reportable under the War Powers Resolution was the quickly aborted Iran rescue mission, the Carter Administration did not build "a body of practice" in complying with the resolution. In 1980, however, the Carter Justice Department did issue a legal memorandum affirming the constitutionality of the time-clock, the Resolution's key provision. See Infra note 116.

[100] "War Powers Resolution Amendments of 1988," S.J. Res. 323, 100th Cong., 2d. Sess. (1988). The Byrd-Warner amendments were introduced May 19, 1988, by Senator Robert Byrd (for himself and Senators Nunn, Warner, and Mitchell) and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. A companion bill, H.J. Res. 601, 100th Cong., 2d Sess. (1988), was introduced June 6, 1988, by Representative Lee Hamilton in the House of Representatives.

In the 101st Congress, Senator Byrd reintroduced this legislation with minor alteration. S.2, 101st Cong., 1st Sess. (1989).

[101] Indeed, although Senator Byrd's 12-year tenure as Senate Democratic Leader was characterized by a stalwart defense of constitutional balance, his explanation of S.J. Res. 323 provides a clear statement of the monarchist model:

The key to the revisions I am proposing [is that it] changes the presumption of the current War Powers Resolution, which is that U.S. Armed Forces must be withdrawn from situations of hostilities or imminent involvement in hostilities within 60 days unless Congress specifically authorizes their continued presence. . . . [T]his legislation requires passage of a specific joint resolution requiring disengagement. 134 CONG. REC. S6174 (daily ed. May 19, 1988.)

[104] Id. at 637 (Jackson, J., concurring). Jackson's analysis warrants extensive quotation:

"Presidential powers are not fixed but fluctuate, depending upon their disjunction or conjunction with those of Congress. We may well begin by a somewhat over-simplified grouping of practical situations in which a President may doubt, or others may challenge, his powers, and by distinguishing roughly the legal consequences of this factor of relativity.

"1. When the President acts pursuant to an express or implied authorization of Congress, his authority is at its maximum, for it includes all that he possesses in his own right plus all that Congress can delegate. In these circumstances, and in these only, may he be said (for what it may be worth) to personify the federal sovereignty. If his act is held unconstitutional under these circumstances, it usually means that the Federal Government as an undivided whole lacks power. A seizure executed by the President pursuant to an Act of Congress would be supported by the strongest of presumptions and the widest latitude of judicial interpretation, and the burden of persuasion would rest heavily upon any who might attack it.

"2. When the President acts in absence of either a congressional grant or denial of authority, he can only rely upon his own independent powers, but there is a zone of twilight in which he and Congress may have concurrent authority, or in which its distribution is uncertain. Therefore, congressional inertia, indifference, or quiescence may sometimes, at least as a practical matter, enable, if not invite, measures on independent presidential responsibility. In this area, any actual test of power is likely to depend on the imperatives of events and contemporary imponderables rather than on abstract theories of law.

"3. When the President takes measures incompatible with the expressed or implied will of Congress, his power is at its lowest ebb, for then he can rely only upon his own constitutional powers minus any constitutional powers of Congress over the matter. Courts can sustain exclusive Presidential control in such a case only by disabling the Congress from acting upon the subject. Presidential claim to a power at once so conclusive and preclusive must be scrutinized with caution, for what is at stake is the equilibrium established by our constitutional system." Id. at 635–38 (footnotes omitted).

[107] See, e.g., Ely, supra note 89, at 1392 n.40. Professor Ely writes:

Enthusiasts of Justice Jackson's concurrence in Youngstown, 343 U.S. at 637, should have little trouble regarding the [War Powers] Resolution as a congressional exercise in mapping the "twilight zone," and therefore plainly constitutional and controlling under the logic of that opinion. (Others of us see the power to commit troops to combat, except in emergency situations, as assigned to the legislative process by the Constitution and thus not in need of rescue from any twilight zone.) Id.

[108] Since this is an authority indisputably not derived from the Constitution, its inclusion would help to underscore the function of this law as an act of authorization—as opposed to a listing of constitutionally derived Presidential powers—accompanied by the delineation of standards and procedures.

[109] The Truman Administration did not cite the Security Council's decision as a basis for this authority; indeed, President Truman decided to commit American air and sea forces to the defense of South Korea on June 25, 1950, only one day after the North Korean invasion. That same day the UN Security Council passed a resolution denouncing the North Korean invasion. But it was not until June 27 that the Security Council passed a second resolution, calling for "urgent military measures . . . to repel the armed attack." A. SCHLESINGER, PRESIDENCY, supra note 12, at 131.

[110] See, for example, this exchange with Lt. Gen. Brent Scowcroft during the Special Subcommittee's hearings:

Senator Biden: President Reagan and others have argued that the existence of the Sandinista regime in Nicaragua is a destabilizing factor in the hemisphere and may lead to broader conflict, involving U.S. interests. Do you believe that the President would have the authority, in order to prevent war, to prevent further conflict, to say I am going to invade Nicaragua with American troops. Does he have the authority to do that?

General Scowcroft: Yes. It may not be prudent if he does not have the support of the Congress, of the country, and a debacle could ensue. But, yes. Special Subcommittee Hearings, supra note 6, at 122.

[111] For valuable analysis relevant to this approach, see id. at 272–79 (testimony of Professor Henkin); id. at 1167–84 (testimony of Professor Glennon); and also letters subsequently submitted by these and other witnesses on the applicability of Justice Jackson's model. Id. at 1405–12.

[114] Statement to the United Nations Security Council, July 15, 1988.

[115] In practice, this "decisiveness" could prove to be elusive in a situation in which the running of the clock was disputed by the President and its expiration was therefore a matter of ambiguity. But Congress could, by simple majority, move to enforce the power of the purse through a parliamentary technique. As discussed later, a Use of Force Act could provide expedited procedures for congressional resolutions designed to make a finding either that the clock, in a particular situation, was running, or that the President has misused his authority to waive the clock. While any such resolution passed by simple majorities in the two houses could not have legal effect (assuming the President vetoed it), it could—in addition to any political and judicial significance—have powerful budgetary effect if Congress had stipulated in its own rules that passage of such a resolution would cause a parliamentary point of order to lie against any subsequent bill containing funds for the perpetuation of that use of force. This technique could not affect funds already appropriated, but would render future funding vulnerable to objection by any one member of Congress.

Although this sounds drastic, it should be emphasized that creating such procedures would be intended primarily to serve as a deterrent, helping to encourage cooperative Presidential participation in the established mechanism. As in the realm of nuclear deterrence, the aim of deploying such "weapons" would be to deter behavior that would cause their use ever to be contemplated.

[116] Indeed, although the Carter Administration avoided pronouncing on the constitutionality of the War Powers Resolution as a whole, the Carter Justice Department issued an important, although little noted, legal opinion affirming the constitutionality of the clock mechanism:

We believe that Congress may, as a general constitutional matter, place a 60-day limit on the use of our armed forces as required by the provisions of [section 5(b)] of the Resolution. The Resolution gives the President the flexibility to extend that deadline for up to 30 days in cases of "unavoidable military necessity." This flexibility is, we believe, sufficient under any scenarios we can hypothesize to preserve his constitutional function as Commander-in-Chief. The practical effect of the 60-day limit is to shift the burden to the President to convince the Congress of the continuing need for the use of our armed forces abroad. We cannot say that placing this burden on the President unconstitutionally intrudes upon his executive powers.

Finally, Congress may regulate the President's exercise of his inherent power by imposing limits by statute.

THE TREATY POWER: UPHOLDING A CONSTITUTIONAL PARTNERSHIP

(By Joseph R. Biden, Jr. and John B. Ritch III)

In June of 1988, as the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union met in Moscow to inaugurate the Treaty on Intermediate-Range Nuclear Forces (INF Treaty), their joint act of ratification ended more than a sixteen year hiatus in codified superpower arms control. It also brought to a close an extraordinary episode in American constitutional history: an unprecedented executive-legislative confrontation over the very nature of the treaty power.

The internecine American dispute had arisen nearly three years earlier when the Reagan Administration attempted to adopt a drastically altered interpretation of the most recently ratified arms accord, the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty of 1972 (ABM Treaty), and to assert a new constitutional theory purporting that such a change was permissible by presidential fiat.[1] The Senate's response, developed through extensive hearings and analysis, culminated only as President Reagan arrived in Moscow, when it consented to ratification of the INF Treaty with a formal "condition." This measure, known as the Biden Condition, acquired the force of domestic United States law upon the Treaty's ratification. Its effect was to repudiate decisively the Administration's theory, which Senate opponents had labeled the Sofaer Doctrine.

This essay recounts significant events leading to the Senate's refutation of the Sofaer Doctrine and offers a rationale for the necessity of the Senate's action.

I. A HISTORY OF THE "REINTERPRETATION" CONTROVERSY

The ABM Treaty "reinterpretation" episode began in March of 1983 when President Reagan, during a nationally-televised address, astonished the world and most of his own advisers by revealing his vision of anti-missile technology that would render nuclear weapons "impotent and obsolete." To observers aware of the contours of nuclear arms control, the inconsistency between the President's declared intent to seek such technology and well-established United States legal obligations under the ABM Treaty was immediately apparent. The ABM Treaty, after all, had been designed to preclude a spiraling race in offensive and defensive technologies and, to that end, embodied a superpower pledge to foreswear precisely the goal of nationwide anti-nuclear defenses that President Reagan had suddenly embraced.

At first, President Reagan's rhetorical flirtation with a "Star Wars" defense seemed no more than a flight of fancy—an ideological expression of the political right's unwillingness to accept a world of nuclear parity and mutual vulnerability with the "evil empire." But the President had unleashed forces of bureaucratic momentum and populist appeal. In an Administration where maximizing defense spending and denigrating arms control were considered parallel virtues,[2] the President's imprimatur quickly gave Star Wars programmatic status as the "Strategic Defense Initiative." Who, against a popular President, could successfully oppose efforts to "defend" the United States?

Still, the SDI threat to the ABM Treaty seemed as remote as the "new technologies" of which the President dreamt. It was not until more than two years after President Reagan's initial revelation that his loyal lieutenants concocted a second surprise, heavy in implications for both arms control and the Constitution. Appearing on a Sunday morning television talk show in October of 1985, National Security Adviser Robert MacFarlane casually dropped the bombshell.

The Reagan Administration, MacFarlane disclosed, had determined that the ABM Treaty, notwithstanding its express purpose, its explicit provisions and all that the Executive Branch had said about its meaning for thirteen years,[3] actually entailed no prohibitions on the development and full-scale testing of ABM systems comprised of "new technologies"—the very system imagined by President Reagan. This announcement, while perhaps a pleasant surprise even to the President himelf, left many in the Senate, the arms control community, and the legal profession agape.[4] Designed and ratified to serve as the bedrock of nuclear arms control, the ABM Treaty was now to be gutted by a unilateral Reagan "reinterpretation."

The Administration's claim derived from a revolutionary reading of the Treaty's "negotiating record" by the State Department's newly-installed Legal Adviser, Abraham Sofaer. His study of this obscure and still-undefined "record," it was asserted, suddenly freed the Reagan Administration to pursue Star Wars unimpeded by a superpower accord that had been negotiated and ratified to proscribe just such activities.

Soon thereafter, Sofaer appeared on Capitol Hill to explain the Administration's archaeological find. In so doing, the Legal Adviser faced two imposing tasks: (1) to argue that the ABM Treaty did not really say what it seemed to say, and (2) to argue that what the Senate was told in 1972 could be disregarded. Encountering congressional skepticism that only intensified after his initial testimony, Sofaer persevered, eventually developing two claims: one facutal, the other legal.

A. Sofaer's two claims

Sofaer's factual claim was that the "negotiating record," a nebulous collection of thirteen-year-old internal United States Government memoranda, demonstrated that the two superpowers had never achieved agreement concerning a permanent ban on the testing and development of nationwide ABM defenses, notwithstanding that such a ban is critical to the logic of the ABM Treaty.[5] Under this "broad interpretation," which Sofaer argued was consistent with the Treaty text [6] and the 1972 Senate ratification proceedings, future space-based and other mobile ABM systems using "other physical principles" were simply exempt from the ABM Treaty's ban.

Initially, Sofaer's factual claim included a bald assertion concerning the ratification proceedings: that Nixon Administration testimony during the 1972 hearings supported the Reagan Administration's new interpretation. Later, however, when this aspect of the factual claim was demonstrated to be egregiously false,[7] Sofaer fell back to an unpersuasive assertion that the ratification record was ambiguous, and substituted a legal claim. The essence of this legal claim was that a President, in interpreting and implementing a treaty, can simply ignore much of what the Executive Branch and told the Senate in obtaining its consent to ratify the treaty. This legal claim became known as the Sofaer Doctrine.

In combination, the two claims were designed to eviscerate the ABM Treaty, clearing the way for the untrammeled pursuit of the President's fantasy of an anti-nuclear astrodome. But the legal claim also had grave and far-reaching implications for all United States treaty-making—not only for the Senate's role, but for the conduct of American diplomacy.

B. The congressional response

Senators Sam Nunn and Carl Levin of the Armed Services Committee took the lead in assessing the factual claim. They quickly moved Sofaer into a defense retreat on the ambiguities he claimed to have found in the Senate's 1972 hearings and debate; they insisted further that the Senate obtain the so-called "negotiating record" so that Sofaer's allegations regarding United States-Soviet diplomatic exchanges in the 1971-72 talks could be examined in cold light. Many months later, in the spring of 1987, these efforts culminated in the issuance of Senator

Nunn's detailed study,[8] which marshalled overwhelming evidence and argument to refute Sofaer's two factual contentions: (1) that the "negotiating record" showed a failure on the part of United States negotiators to obtain Soviet agreement to the traditional interpretation; and (2) that the ratificaton proceedings supported the broad interpretation or were ambiguous. Senators Levin and Nunn went on to attach an amendment to the 1987 Defense Authorization bill, which blocked any SDI tests that would have been permitted by the broad interpretation.[9]

The Foreign Relations and Judiciary Committees, meanwhile, focused on the constitutional claim that Sofaer was developing as he found it increasingly difficult to sustain his factual claim concerning the Nixon Administration's 1972 testimony. In joint hearings[10] the two Committees sought to examine a question never before posed in 200 years of constitutional history: Can the President unilaterally and fundamentally change a treaty by "reinterpreting" it in disregard of executive representations originally tendered to the Senate?

Testimony by eminent constitutional scholars answered this question decisively in the negative[11] and helped lay the groundwork for the drafting of Senate Resolution 167, The ABM Treaty Interpretation Resolution.[12] Introduced in March of 1987, it set forth a combination of relevant constitutional principles and contemporary facts which together yielded an inexorable conclusion: that only the traditional interpretation of the ABM Treaty, banning development and testing of present and future ABM technologies, is valid constitutionally, as well as under international law. In September of 1987, when the Foreign Relations Committee approved Senate Resolution 167 and sent it to the full Senate, the accompanying Committee report[13] concluded with sharp words concerning the Reagan Administration's legal machinations.[14]

"The Legal Adviser is * * * charged with American compliance with—and American efforts to enforce—the most momentous elements of the rule of law: rules of constitutional power, of international commitment, of war and peace. It is the Legal Adviser who, through his own integrity and the integrity of the legal analysis he oversees, must set the highest standards in honoring the law of the Constitution and the law of nations. It is the Legal Adviser who, when asked to "legalize" short-term policy ends over constitutional means, must be prepared to say no. It is the Legal Adviser who, regardless of political pressures, must revere law as the alternative to anarchy.

"By failing to meet the standard, Mr. Sofaer has done a disservice to the Office of Legal Adviser. * * *

"The Committee can find no evidence to contradict the conclusion that the Reagan Administration's "reinterpretation" of the ABM Treaty constitutes the most flagrant abuse of the Constitution's treaty power in 200 years of American history. * * *

No standard is more fundamental to civilization than the value of honoring a solemn pledge. While the "reinterpretation" debate has raised many complex and technical questions of international and constitutional law, beneath them all is a simple value with which every American is familiar: the value of honesty.

"In seeking to distort the ABM Treaty through the sham of a "reinterpretation," the Administration has denigrated this value in the interest of pursuing a Presidential dream—that the United States can find safety in the nuclear age through the erection of an anti-nuclear astrodome. Some in the Senate support this goal; others regard it as naive, futile, and dangerous. But that debate aside, it should be taken as unarguably true that corrupting our own institutions and constitutional processes is not an effective way to defend the United States of America." [15]

This effort to deal with Sofaer's constitutional claim regarding the ABM Treaty helped to establish a legal and political basis for more formal action by the full Senate to address the treaty interpretation issue in connection with INF Treaty. In January of 1988, after the INF Treaty had been submitted to the Senate and referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, the Biden Condition[16] was formulated with the aim of repudiating this claim by exercising the Senate's prerogative to render conditional consent to the ratification of a treaty.[17]

In design, the Biden Condition was phrased positively to affirm the principle that in implementing a treaty, the Executive must honor the interpretation shared by the Executive and the Senate at the time of ratification. But the Biden Condition's implicit purpose was negative: to lay permanently to rest the Legal Adviser's newly-spawned legal doctrine—a doctrine that threatened not only the ABM Treaty, but the very foundation of the executive-legislative partnership in treaty-making as mandated by the Constitution.

II. THE SOFAER DOCTRINE

The precise details of the Sofaer Doctrine had emerged gradually in Administration testimony, statements and "studies," and—for political rather than logical reasons—had become increasingly crucial to the case for reinterpretation. On a logical level, opponents of the "reinterpretation" could argue soundly that the Administration's factual claim regarding the content of the "negotiating record" was simply invalid, and that any further debate over the President's constitutional latitude to "reinterpret" was therefore moot. But in a practical political context dominated by a popular President who dreamt of defending the United States by neutralizing the nuclear threat, this argument was far from compelling. To the electorate and to some Senators, the very purpose of the ABM Treaty appeared counter/intuitive. The provisions of the Treaty text were intricate in their interaction and not widely understood. And the so-called "negotiating record"—hundreds of pages of still-classified memoranda confusing both in their content[18] and their legal status—compounded the ABM Treaty's vulnerability to distorted description and general obfuscation.

In contrast, the publicly available and comparatively straightforward 1972 ratification proceedings were not shielded behind this smokescreen and therefore presented the "reinterpreters" with a more difficult challenge. Once Senators Levin and Nunn, and then the joint Foreign Relations-Judiciary Committee hearings, had undermined Sofaer's original factual claim that the 1972 proceedings were ambiguous, the case for the "reinterpretation" became heavily dependent upon justifying the proposition that those proceedings, whatever their content, imposed no constraint on future presidential interpretations of the ABM Treaty. Thus, Sofaer and his colleagues eventually found themselves fixated on contriving a legal argument that the Executive is simply not bound by much of what it has told the Senate in seeking consent to a treaty's ratification.

On March 17, 1988, as the Foreign Relations Committee prepared to act on the INF Treaty and the Biden Condition, the Administration provided its critique of the Condition in a formal letter.[19] Although signed by White House Counsel Arthur Culvahouse,[20] this letter expressed the Sofaer Doctrine in its most crystalline form. The President, said the Reagan White House, is bound by a particular interpretation of a treaty provision only if it meets three criteria: when consent was given, the interpretation must have been (1) "generally understood" by the Senate, (2) "clearly intended" by the Senate, and (3) "relied upon" by the Senate.[21]

The Administration described these criteria, which appeared so beguilingly straightforward and superficially unobjectionable, as comprising a "settled principle." [22] But in fact the Sofaer criteria were asserted with no constitutional basis: no reference to the intent of the Framers, to historical precedent, to case law—no reference to any source of constitutional authority. These alleged "principles" were simply invented.

Efforts within the Senate to refute the Sofaer Doctrine faced two obstacles: (1) a phalanx of Star Wars supporters, who in any case might have elevated the President's dream of a strategic defense above what seemed a constitutional technicality, and (2) the difficulty of explaining the implications of the Sofaer criteria. After all, everyone concerned could agree that if these criteria were met, the Executive would be bound. It required considerable effort to focus Senators, much less public interest, on the fact that such criteria, if accepted, would in practice be so difficult to meet that the Executive would almost never be bound by its own presentation to the Senate. Within the criteria lay these virtually unanswerable questions:

(1) How many Senators must speak on a given interpretation before it can be proven that the Senate "generally understood" that interpretation, and what standards are to be used in ascertaining what was understood?

(2) Unless the Senate has affirmed a particular interpretation by means of a formal condition, how can it ever be demonstrated that the Senate "clearly intended" a particular interpretation?

(3) If "relied upon" means that a particular interpretation was crucial to the Senate's action in approving a treaty or refraining from the imposition of a formal condition, how can the Senate's collective motivation ever be proven?

Yet, under the Sofaer Doctrine, all three proofs would be required to forestall a "reinterpretation." Thus, in its effect, the Sofaer Doctrine was a claim of wide executive latitude to change a treaty's meaning by means of the assertion, in the context of domestic law, of extreme and unreasonable criteria for what may not be reinterpreted.

As a matter of principle, the Doctrine threatened to nullify the Senate's constitutional role in the treaty power. But as a matter of practicality, the Sofaer Doctrine threatened paralysis in American treaty-making—since the Senate's only recourse would be to attach elaborate and numerous conditions to treaties in order to ensure that its understanding became an integral and explicit part of a treaty's ratification documents.

A. Fundamental flaw

The critical flaw in the Sofaer Doctrine was its faulty premise that the Senate is not an integral part of establishing the meaning of a treaty under United States constitutional law except insofar as the Senate does so through affirmative steps which impose restrictions on executive latitude [23] In relying on this premise, the Doctrine was fundamentally inconsistent with the basic model of United States treaty-making, wherein the Executive negotiates a treaty, explains its meaning to the Senate, and on that basis is accorded consent to ratify the treaty. Instead, the Doctrine called for the Senate to demonstrate a specific understanding, intent and motivation concerning every treaty provision, lest that provision be subject to any interpretation a President might later prefer.

In its INF Treaty Report, the Foreign Relations Committee elaborated on the defining and binding significance of the Senate's understanding of a treaty's meaning:

"Under the Constitution, the President may ratify only a treaty to which the Senate advised and consented. And it must be taken as axiomatic that the Senate cannot consent to that which it did not understand. Accordingly, the operative principle of treaty-making under the Constitution must be that, as co-makers of a treaty for the United States, the Executive and the Senate share a common understanding of a treaty which has binding significance domestically as the treaty, upon ratification, becomes an integral part of United States law.[24]

The Committee Report then emphasized where this common understanding is to be found:

In the establishment and determination of that common understanding, the concept of legislative intent must be as applicable to treaties as it is to statutory law, in which intent may be explicit or implicit. . . .

What is crucial is that legislative intent, with regard to a treaty as well as a statute, is expressed not only in language drafted by legislators but in unchallenged communications of the Executive. Under longstanding principles of textural construction, Executive communications to the Congress concerning the meaning of a text are evidence of the meaning of that text if Congress (or the Senate) acquiesces in that meaning. In other words, the legislative branch is deemed to be placed on notice by the Executive that certain words will be construed in a certain manner. If Congress wishes a different meaning to obtain, it may act so as to effect that different meaning. If Congress does not act, however, it is properly deemed to have accepted—and to intend—the meaning communicated by the Executive.

* * * Professor Louis Henkin, chief reporter of the new Restatement of U.S. Foreign Relations Law, summarized this concept as follows: "Where several [Executive] statements are made and there is general acceptance of their tenor, that is the Senate understanding. That is true in the case of Senate consent to a treaty, as it would be in the legislative history of a statute."

Clearly, in determining whether the Senate consented to the ratification of a treaty pursuant to an implicit understanding, a rule of reason must apply. Obviously, where the indicia of Senate intent or understanding (including unchallenged Executive communications or explanations) are few or inconsistent, no implicit Senate intent can reasonably be said to exist. On the other hand, where the indicia of intent (again, including unchallenged Executive communications or explanations) are several and largely consistent, an implicit intent can reasonably be concluded to exist. In such circumstances, the President is bound constitutionally to regard that intent as an implicit Senate understanding, and therefore an implicit condition of the Senate's consent. The Chief Executive cannot bring the treaty into force unless it reflects that condition, and subsequent Presidents must interpret the treaty subject to that intent.

The essence of the Sofaer Doctrine is to reject this concept of legislative intent as it has been normally understood. * * *[25]

In truth, the Senate's understanding of a treaty is usually implicit—that is, registered via acceptance of executive representations. Indeed, the Sofaer Doctrine entailed a profound irony. Since implicit understanding is most likely to occur on those points where there is no controversy requiring explicit resolution, the Doctrine, by discounting implicit understanding, could render vulnerable to "reinterpretation" precisely those points on which there was full consensus at the time of ratification.[26]

B. The "negotiating record" and international law

One consequence of Sofaer's stratagems was pervasive confusion about the legal significance of the so-called "negotiating record" of a treaty. His argument, after all, was that the traditional interpretation of the ABM Treaty, even if presented to the Senate and generally accepted by all parties for thirteen years, must be subordinated to the real treaty obligations that might be discovered subsequently in such a "record." It therefore bears emphasis that there is, definitively, no such thing as a negotiating record.

Ironically, the vestigial and undefined quality of treaty "records" was underscored by Sofaer himself when he testified in March of 1987 that the search for the United States ABM Treaty "record"—that is, any and all documents and memoranda pertaining to the Treaty negotiation—was still underway and that documents were "continuing to turn up out of the boxes that are arriving in my office from various storage facilities."[27] This statement occurred seventeen months after Sofaer had placed the prestige of his office and the honor of the United States behind a radical and unilateral United States revision of the ABM Treaty on the authority of the "negotiating record."

Not only were these documents unknown to the Senate in 1972 and insufficient to meet any agreed definition of a "negotiating record," they also had, under any definition, only the most tenuous status under international law.[28] On matters of treaty interpretation, international law looks to the treaty text as the primary source. "Subsequent practice" of the parties in implementing the treaty also carries great weight. True, in areas where the text and subsequent practice leave ambiguity, the original intent of the parties—as reflected in what they said in arriving at the treaty—may have interpretive significance. But in and of themselves, internal United States Government memoranda have virtually no standing under international law. And even documents shared by the parties represent no more than evidence as to where the negotiating process stood at a given point.

In the case of the ABM Treaty, both the text (except when read perversely) and thirteen years of subsequent practice (both behavioral and rhetorical) supported the traditional interpretation. Nonetheless, the Administration was relying on a collection of still-classified United States documents (and, as Senator Nunn had discovered, a distorted reading of those documents) as justification for asserting a radical revision of the Treaty in the context of international law.

The Administration recognized, of course, that the President's highest duty—higher than any duty deriving from international law—is to observe his domestic obligations under the Constitution. For example, if a United States statute conflicts with an earlier United States treaty commitment, his constitutional imperative is to obey the statute. The role of the newly-minted Sofaer Doctrine was to minimize the requirements imposed by such constitutional obligations, thereby freeing the Executive to act on its "reinterpretation" internationally without constraint under domestic law.

Thus, in the effort to stretch the ABM Treaty to accommodate Star Wars, the roles of the "negotiating record" and the Sofaer Doctrine were analogous to a one-two punch—both illegal.[29]

C. The "Two Treaties" Issue

To deflect criticism over their cavalier design to discount the significance of treaty ratification proceedings, Sofaer and his allies relied heavily on what might be called the "two treaties" argument.[30] Referring to the Executive's two sets of obligations—under domestic and international law—with respect to given treaty, they raised a fearsome specter. If the Executive is constrained by what it told the Senate, might not the United States someday find itself hamstrung vis-á-vis another nation, such as the Soviet Union, which remained free to apply a less restrictive interpretation of a treaty? Implicit was a message of macho realpolitik: fastidious concern for constitutional niceties could gravely disadvantage the United States on the global battlefield.[31]

This argument, however, appealed more effectively to emotion than to reason. Of course, it is possible to hypothesize a "two treaties" scenario in which the Executive, perhaps inadvertently, presents an overly restrictive interpretation to the Senate. Indeed, one can imagine such a case even under the Sofaer Doctrine, since it allows that some, albeit very little, executive testimony may be binding. But in practice "two treaties" has not proven to be a problem, and it was profoundly revealing that Sofaer and others were never able to point to a realworld example.

Certainly, the ABM Treaty was not a case in point. Here it was not the Soviets but the United States seeking to apply a less restrictive version. The interpretation still accepted by the Soviet Union comported fully with the meaning originally presented to the Senate.

Nor, as a matter of principle, should it be accepted that differences could commonly exist between what the Executive agreed with the other party and the explanations provided to the Senate. As the Foreign Relations Committee stressed:

There should be no such difference. It is the Executive's responsibility to ensure sufficient clarity in a treaty, and in its explanations thereof to the Senate, so that no conflict exists between the shared understanding of the parties on the one hand and the shared understanding of the Executive and Senate on the other. If, in extremis, such conflict should arise and prove not resolvable by discussion or negotiation with the other party, the United States of course has the option of withdrawing from the treaty.

In sum, this largely theoretical problem should be addressed if and when it arises—not by a preemptive alteration of constitutional principles. The Senate should not accept a doctrine that assumes and protects carelessness or deviousness on the part of the Executive.[32]

III. The Biden Condition

Developed against the backdrop of this controversy,[33] the Biden Condition had four crucial elements:

(1) the principle that the original "shared understanding" held by the Executive and the Senate must govern United States interpretation and implementation of a treaty;

(2) the principle that the basis for this common understanding is the text of the treaty, as elaborated by the Executive's formal representations to the Senate in seeking consent to ratification;

(3) the principle (really a corollary of the first principle) that the Executive may not, acting alone, adopt a new interpretation of a treaty; and

(4) a reference to the Constitution as the source of these principles.

As both supporters and opponents of the Condition recognized, the last element was critical. While it was understood that, technically, the Condition would apply its interpretation requirement only to the INF Treaty, it was also recognized that couching the requirement as one which the Senate viewed as a constitutional principle would give the Condition a larger significance.

Indeed, reference to the Constitution was essential to prevent the Condition from being stood on its head. Without that reference, the "principle" being applied would be ad hoc, and thus no principle at all. The Condition would then carry the implication that unless the Senate, in consenting to a treaty, specifically stipulated such a requirement—as it had not done in consenting to the ABM Treaty—no such requirement would apply. Thus, divested of a reference to the Constitution, the Biden Condition could have become an argument favoring the ABM Treaty "reinterpretation," as well as precedent suggesting the need for such a condition on every future treaty.

Although branded as doing so, the Biden Condition represented no effort to shift the constitutional allocation of powers between President and Congress. Rather, the Condition simply aimed to express and affirm a long-standing, if never-before-articulated, principle: to wit, that the "shared understanding" of the Executive and the Senate as reflected in the Executive's formal representations, is indeed fully binding, as opposed to binding only with regard to those provisions and interpretations that the Senate has gone to extraordinary lengths to brand as crucial to its consent, by a formal condition or some other means.

Unlike the Sofaer Doctrine, the Biden Condition was based on a conception of the Executive and the Senate not as adversaries in the treaty-making process, but as partners—co-makers of the treaty on behalf of the United States. True, both the Biden Condition and the Sofaer Doctrine rested upon the premise that a "shared understanding" is required to bind the Executive to a given interpretation of a treaty, but the key difference concerned the locus of that "shared understanding." As stated in the Biden Condition, that locus is the body of all "authoritative" statements rendered by the Executive in seeking consent to ratification. According to the Sofaer Doctrine, the Executive would be bound only by those "shared understandings" which the Senate somehow labled as being crucial to its consent by fulfilling the criteria of "generally understood, clearly intended, and relied upon."

Recognizing that such fine distinctions were not the grist of normal political discourse, the Foreign Relations Committee was at pains in its INF Treaty Report to emphasize the role the Biden Condition was and was not intended to play.[34] The Committee also stressed that the primary source for treaty interpretation is not the process of what occurred in the negotiation or what can be found in any party's "record" thereof, but rather the resulting treaty document—the signed and ratified text:

Both domestic and international law give primacy in treaty interpretation to the text of the treaty. International law requires that a treaty be interpreted in accordance with the ordinary meaning to be given the treaty's terms in light of their context and in light of the treaty's object and purpose. Domestic law does not differ, and is also premised on the assumption that the Executive and the Senate, as co-makers of a treaty for the United States, will share a common understanding of a treaty's text. As a matter of record, that common understanding of the text will be reflected in the Executive's formal presentation of the treaty to the Senate: in formal presentation documents, in prepared testimony, and in verbal and written intercourse regarding the treaty's meaning and effect.[35]

The Committee also sought to rebut the Administration's charge that the passage of the Biden Condition would bind the Administration to every statement of any Executive Branch official, even statements accidentally in error:

The Committee wishes to emphasize that in asserting the binding significance of the Executive's original representations, it has articulated the principle with great care. Whereas some formulations [might] have asserted that the Executive is directly and explicitly "bound by" its representations, the Biden Condition makes no such assertion. Rather, beginning with the premise of Executive-Seante partnership in the making of treaties, it asserts only the binding quality of the original "shared understanding" and then asserts a derivative principle: that this "shared understanding" of a treaty's text is "reflected in"—meaning evidenced by—the Executive's authoritative representations "insofar as such representations are directed to the meaning and legal effect of the text of the Treaty."

This construction helps to underscore that a rule of reason must apply in instances where inconsistencies may appear, lest the Executive be "bound by" two inconsistent requirements. Thus, the Biden Condition is precisely and carefully balanced in seeking to articulate the constitutional principles it aims to uphold . . .[36]

Certainly, substantial weight must be accorded the Executive's formal presentation documents, which include the treaty itself and a detailed explanation of the Executive's understanding of the treaty's terms. Considerable weight must also be accorded the prepared testimony of top executive officials. Additional information elicited during the Executive-Senate interaction regarding the meaning and legal effect of treaty terms will also be important because such discussion and questioning will cover items of particular interest and concern to the Senate, as a co-maker of the treaty for the United States. The overall significance of Executive Branch representations makes it incumbent upon the Executive to take great care to avoid or remove any inconsistency in its overall presentation of a treaty. The possibility, however, that the Executive may prove fallible—that an "authoritative" representation could, on rare occasion, be inconsistent with the text of the treaty, or with another "authoritative" representation—is simply an unavoidable fact of life which does not in any way diminish the crucial role of such representations in providing evidence of the common understanding of the text of a treaty held originally by the Executive and the the Senate as co-makers of a treaty.[37]

In addition, the Committee warned that given the Executive's assertion of the Sofaer Doctrine, the only practical alternative to the Biden Condition would be "to lade the INF Treaty and its resolution of ratification with an enormous burden of formal amendments, stipulations, conditions, and the like, which could require months of debate."[38]

A. Senate consideration of the Biden condition

While it was obvious that Senate opposition to the Condition would be led by dedicated Star Warriors, the key question was whether some Administration loyalists could be won over by emphasizing the constitutional issue, including the direct question of Senate prerogative. To make the case more palatable, Condition advocates[39] were at pains to stress that the principles being affirmed did not lay to rest the entire ABM issue, but only the legal claim. Passage of the Condition, they reiterated, would not resolve the ABM Treaty debate, but simply confine it to a dispute over facts concerning the "negotiating record" and the ratification proceedings of 1972.

Nonetheless, battle lines were quickly drawn as the Administration—perhaps in recognition of the weakness of the factual case—moved strongly to solidify the ranks of its supporters in the Senate, including moderates, against the Condition. Both in the lead-up to the Committee vote and before the vote on the Senate floor, extensive negotiations occurred on a "compromise." Invariably, however, such proposals put forward by the Administration and its Senate loyalists had three characteristics:

(1) language introducing the concept of international law,[40]

(2) language that would incorporate the Sofaer Doctrine criteria (that is, "generally understood," etc.) into the Condition, and

(3) deletion of any mention of the Constitution.

Supporters of the Condition, however, stood fast against any such "compromise," recognizing that each element was insidious:

(1) proposed references to international law carried an implication that the United States has two sets of obligations under a treaty and might have to subordinate one to another (that is, what the Executive told the Senate might, on occasion, have to be subordinated to the supposedly higher truth of the "negotiating record"),

(2) introducing the Sofaer criteria into a text designed to refute the Doctrine was clearly perverse, and

(3) reference to the Constitution was imperative to demonstrate that the Senate was asserting principles inherently applicable to all treaties as opposed to imposing an ad hoc policy on the INF Treaty.

In April, the Foreign Relations Committee reported the INF Treaty to the full Senate after a contentious debate and adoption of the Condition on a twelve-to-seven vote.

As floor debate began, the treaty interpretation issue occasioned some worry in the arms control community that the controversy could delay or even scuttle the INF Treaty. Nonetheless, Majority Leader Robert Byrd, backed by Senators Nunn, Sarbanes, and Levin, took a firm stand in defense of constitutional principle.

In preparation for a vote, Senator Byrd made a slight modification in the Biden Condition in order to protect it procedurally from further amendment.[41] With negotiations stalemated, the Leader made clear his determination to let the matter be settled on a close vote if necessary, his position strengthened by a calculus that support for the INF Treaty was sufficiently strong so that the Treaty would prevail with or without the Condition. Finally, with a vote only hours away, Senator William Cohen, a Republican who was a stalwart opponent of the "reinterpretation," made a valuable suggestion, aimed at providing political "cover" for Senators who did not wish to confront the President directly on a high-stakes ideological issue but who recognized the validity of the Condition.

Senator Cohen reasoned that while the factual claim of ambiguity in the 1972 Nixon Administration testimony had been repudiated already, it nonetheless remained an integral part of the mythology underpinning the "reinterpretation." Therefore, why not take into account the possibility of "ambiguous testimony"? Since the Condition was intended only to affirm the principle that the original "shared understanding" must govern treaty implementation, why not add a corollary that would cover the situation alleged in the ill-founded factual claim: to wit, that where no "common understanding" has been reached between the Senate and the Executive, a treaty will be interpreted in accordance with applicable United States law?

One may only speculate about the internecine discussions that ensued among Administration representatives and their Senate supporters; perhaps historians will someday learn more. Since it followed logically from the other elements of the Biden Condition, the Cohen Corollary was accepted readily by Condition advocates. Nonetheless, this change precipitated the significant shift toward bipartisanship that Condition supporters sought.

More surprisingly, the Administration seemed to acquiesce. Senator Arlen Specter, an opponent of the Condition, noted that suddenly the Administration's position was "enormously different from what [it] has staunchly contended up to . . . recently."[42] He accused the Administration of "unconditional surrender . . . joined in by a number of my colleagues on this side of the aisle."[43]

On May 26, with Senators Nunn, Sarbanes, Levin, Cranston, and Dodd leading the debate, and with key Republican leaders, including Senators Dole, Lugar, and Kassebaum, shifting position to join in support, the Senate voted 72-27 in favor of the Biden Condition.

Although this result was quite sufficient to sound the death-knell for the Sofaer Doctrine, the victory was subsequently sharpened, before the final vote on the Treaty, when opponents of the Condition sought to raise the issue anew—with three proposals.

Two, sponsored by Senators Wilson and Specter, respectively, sought to introduce the concept of international law. Condition advocates opposed this, as they had during the "compromise" negotiations, on the grounds that the Condition was directed solely at domestic law and that the proposed language not only confused the issue, but implied the possibility that obligations under international law commonly could conflict with and supercede the imperatives of domestic law. Both amendments were defeated soundly.

In a third proposal of particular significance, Senator Specter offered an amendment "as a means of clarifying the Biden Condition." Notwithstanding that description, the Specter Amendment would have explicitly affirmed the Sofaer criteria by adding these words: "Such common understanding means a shared interpretarion which is both authoritatively communicated to the Senate by the Executive and clearly intended, generally understood and relied upon by the Senate in its advice and consent to ratification."[44]

Whereas the vote on the Biden Condition had been an indirect vote on the Sofaer Doctrine, the Specter Amendment afforded an opportunity to vote on the Doctrine directly. After advocates of the Condition had reemphasized the perversity of affirming the Sofaer Doctrine in a condition intended to repudiate it, the Specter Amendment was rejected 67-30, a result that served to underscore the significance of the earlier vote on the Condition itself.

B. The Reagan letter: a final skirmish

On June 10, having ratified the Treaty, President Reagan conveyed a formal message to the Senate, clearly intended by Administration lawyers to dilute the Senate's action and to cast doubt on the legal status of the Biden Condition. The President declared that he could not "accept the proposition that a condition in a resolution of ratification can alter the allocation of rights and duties under the Constitution."[45]

In a formal response,[46] the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Claiborne Pell, emphasized that the Biden Condition was not aimed at altering the Constitution but at demonstrating the Senate's unwillingness to acquiesce in an Administration effort to undercut the Constitution's allocation of a joint Executive-Senate role in the exercise of the Treaty Power. As to the legal status of the Senate's action, Senator Pell quoted from the Foreign Relations Committee's INF Treaty Report:

[T]he Condition is binding under domestic law, and obtains its binding effect because the President, in the absence of the resolution of ratification, lacks authority to participate in the Treaty's ratification. He obtains such authority through the resolution of ratification and is governed by any stipulations by which the Senate conditions its consent.

In sum, the President may not act upon the Senate's consent without honoring this Condition. Nothing that he or his Administration does, by statement or action, whether before or after the act of ratification, can alter the binding effect of any condition which the Senate places upon its consent to treaty ratification. If the President brings the INF Treaty into force, the [Biden] Condition takes effect.[47]

Senator Pell concluded: "The Sofaer Doctrine has been formally and overwhelmingly rejected. And nothing in the President's post-ratification letter has changed or could change that fact."[48] As Senator Nunn put it, "The President's letter is entertaining but irrelevant. The Treaty, including this Condition, is now the supreme law of the land. And the President can no more change it with a letter than he can change any other law with a letter."[49]

IV. IMPLICATIONS

A. Implications for the ABM treaty

As its supporters repeatedly emphasized, the Biden Condition was not designed to resolve the question of alleged ambiguities in the genesis, design and implementation of the ABM Treaty. Accordingly, the Condition by itself could not constitute a final disposition of the issue of ABM Treaty interpretation. Rather, the provision was intended to repudiate the Sofaer Doctrine by affirming certain constitutional principles that were brought into question during the ABM Treaty debate.

The implications for the ABM Treaty, however, are clear and profound. As the floor debate drew to a close, Senators on both sides of the "reinterpretation" issue recognized this significance:

Senator NUNN. "[The Condition] affirms enduring constitutional principles which apply to the interpretation of all treaties, including the ABM Treaty."[50]

Senator LEVIN. "[T]he principles set forth in this amendment apply to all treaties. That is why we fought so hard to keep the words in this amendment 'the Treaty Clauses of the Constitution.' "[51]

Senator MCCLURE (a Condition opponent). "This is not some one-time deal. . . . This amendment would affect all treaties, not just the treaty at hand."[52]

The Senate's formal repudiation of the Sofaer Doctrine means that the case for the ABM Treaty "reinterpretation" now rests solely on what is left of Sofaer's factual claims—claims already widely and justifiable denigrated. The residual debris of this "factual" case many be summarized as follows:

Text. The "reinterpretation" is, on its face, inconsistent with any fair and informed reading of the Treaty document itself.[53]

"Negotiating Record." The so-called "record" of the ABM Treaty negotiation cannot serve, under either constitutional or international law, in the role assigned to it by the "reinterpreters" and, in any case, does not sustain the Sofaer-Reagan interpretation—as demonstrated by Senator Nunn's extensive study and as attested by an array of distinguished former officials who negotiated the ABM Treaty.[54]

Ratification Proceedings. Finally, as regards the Senate's consideration of the ABM Treaty in 1972, those proceedings do not support the "reinterpretation," as even the Legal Adviser has acknowledged, and the claim of ambiguity is plainly belied by any reasonable assessment of this publicly available record.[55]

There is indeed little left of the ABM Treaty "reinterpretation," other than the memory of a failed and disgraced effort to distort the Constitution and a solemn treaty obligation of the United States. That obligation was incurred in pursuit of the American national security interest and should be honored faithfully unless and until compelling reasons of national security require formal United States withdrawal, through procedures stipulated in the Treaty itself, from the ABM Treaty regime.

This is not to say that the future of the ABM Treaty is assured. As a candidate, President Bush pledged fealty to the Reagan dream of deploying a strategic defense, a step that would entail abrogation of the ABM Treaty. But that issue can be addressed, in honorable public debate, on its strategic merits and without further efforts to employ the sham of a treaty "reinterpretation."

B. Implications for future treaties

As to future treaties, one lesson that should not be drawn from this saga is the need of the Senate to see a treaty's "negotiating record."[56] In preparation for dealing with the treaty interpretation issue in the context of the INF Treaty ratification proceedings, some Senators demanded that "record" in order to underscore that the Administration's assertions about the role of the Senate in treaty-making had destroyed any basis on which the Senate could operate in confidence of executive good faith. They also wished to demonstrate that the practical consequence of the Sofaer Doctrine was an inordinately cumbersome process that could burden this and all future treaties.

As it happened, however, the Reagan Administration complied readily with this request, probably recognizing that to do so played conveniently into its ABM Treaty-related assertion that the "record" was where ultimate truth was to be found. But there are sound reasons why this should not become a precedent, as the Foreign Relations Committee's INF Treaty Report emphasized:

First, a systemic expectation of Senate perusal of every key treaty's "negotiating record" would inhibit candor during future negotiations and could be expected to induce posturing on the part of U.S. negotiators and their counterparts during sensitive discussions.

Second, by seeking possession of the myriad internal Executive memoranda comprising the "negotiating record," the Senate would impose upon itself a considerable task with no clear purpose. Because this "record" does not constitute an agreed account of the negotiations, such documents have no formal standing. Accordingly, regularized efforts to reconcile these "snapshots" of the negotiation process with the resulting treaty text as explained by the Executive would serve only to divert the Senate's attention from the central aim of the ratification process—which is to build, between the Executive and the Senate, a clear "shared understanding" of the treaty text and the obligations which that text entails.

The overall effect—fully exposed negotiations followed by a far more complicated Senate review—would be to weaken the treaty-making process and thereby to damage American diplomacy.[57]

V. CONCLUSION

As to the ultimate constitutional significance of the Senate's action in approving the Biden Condition, the Foreign Relations Committee adopted this balanced perspective:

The Committee notes that, in one respect, its action in including this Condition in the INF Treaty's resolution of ratification was unnecessary insofar as principles which inherently apply to the INF Treaty would apply even in the absence of any Senate action affirming them. Given the circumstances, however, the Committee judged that the fail to affirm such principles could suggest some degree of acquiescence in the Sofaer Doctrine, which the Committee views as an Executive attempt to assert an unconstitutional arrogation of the Treaty Power. In this sense the Committee views the Biden Condition, paradoxically, as both unnecessary and highly significant.[58]

In looking back on the "reinterpretation" saga, one might well find added reason to admire the wisdom of the Founding Fathers. Among the Framers, it was Alexander Hamilton who, though renowned as the leading advocate of a strong presidency, stressed that it would have been "utterly unsafe and improper"[59] to entrust the power of making treaties to the President alone. Indeed, Hamilton's most famous dictum applied directly to the Treaty Power:

This history of human conduct does not warrant that exalted opinion of human virtue which would make it wise in a nation to commit interests of so delicate and momentous a kind, as those which concern its intercourse with the rest of the world, to the sole disposal of a magistrate created and circumstanced as would be a President of the United States.[60]

Hamilton concluded, accordingly, that the Framers' division of the Treaty Power between the Executive and the Senate was "one of the best digested and most unexceptional parts of the plan."[61]

The essence of the Treaty Power is the the President and the Senate are partners in the process by which the United States enters into, and adheres to, international obligations. Through its response to the Reagan Administration's foray into treaty "reinterpretation"—an episode fully reflective of Hamilton's sober view of human nature—the Senate acted effectively to uphold that constitutional partnership.

[1] See Koplow, Constitutional Bail and Switch: Executive Reinterpretation of Arms Control Treaties, 137 U. PA. L. REV. 1353, 1374 n.83 (1989).

[2] President Reagan's eleventh hour conversion to arms control did, of course, help to produce the INF Treaty—with a considerable assist from General Secretary Gorbachev, who surprised all concerned by accepting a United States proposal (the so-called "zero option") that Administration officials originally regarded as "non-negotiable." The pure public-relations purpose of the original Reagan zero-option proposal is discussed at length in A. Haig, Caveat: Realism, Reagan, and Foreign Policy (1984), and S. Talbott, Deadly Gambits: The Reagan Administration and the Stalemate in Nuclear Arms Control (1984).

But the INF Treaty could not obscure the larger picture. After remaining for five years within the ceilings of the unratified SALT II Treaty, the Reagan Administration had denounced the treaty and intentionally exceeded its limits, thereby ending all constraints on strategic-range nuclear arms. Meanwhile, progress toward a new agreement on strategic arms remained blocked by the President's unwillingness to reaffirm or renegotiate the ABM Treaty. Simultaneously, the Reagan Administration maintained a determined opposition to negotiated limits on nuclear testing.

Thus, the INF Treaty's belated and marginal reductions in nuclear warheads, representing approximately three to four percent of the two sides' arsenals, occurred in a context in which the overall framework of arms control had eroded. Indeed, despite the image of arms control progress, at the end of President Reagan's second term the territory of the United States was targeted by approximately forty percent more Soviet warheads than when Reagan was inaugurated.

[3] See, for example, the annual Arms Control Impact Statements, required by law and transmitted to Congress on behalf of the President after extensive inter-agency review. For the fiscal years 1980–1984, before his advisers had invented the "reinterpretation," the Reagan Administration's own submissions contained clear and unambiguous descriptions of the ABM Treaty as traditionally interpreted.

[4] For their part, in strong language that in this instance proved apposite, the Soviets labelled it a "deliberate deceit." Marshall Akhromeyev, Chief of the Soviet General Staff, Washington's Assertions and the Real Facts, Pravda, Oct. 19, 1985.

[5] Because the transition from successful testing of an ABM system to full-scale production and nationwide deployment has the potential to be accomplished swiftly, and possibly behind a veil of secrecy, the erection of a barrier at an earlier stage—through a prohibition on development and testing—had been considered crucial to the ABM Treaty's function of precluding a spiraling competition in offensive and defensive systems.

[6] For a lucid explication of the ABM Treaty's provisions and of the tortured logic required of Sofaer in trying to impose the "reinterpretation" on the Treaty's text, see Chayes & Chayes, Testing and Development of "Exotic" Systems Under the ABM Treaty: The Great Reinterpretation Caper, 99 Harv. L. Rev. 1956 (1986).

The Legal Adviser presented his own view in the same journal issue, but later recanted that aspect of his article relating to the 1972 ratification proceedings, citing faulty research by unnamed assistants. See infra note 7.

[7] Sofaer attributed the error to "young lawyers" on his staff. See The ABM Treaty and the Constitution: Joint Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations and the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary, 100th Cong., 1st Sess. 2-3, 131-32 (1987) [hereinafter Joint Hearings]. Regarding his factual claim as it related to the ratification proceedings, Sofaer responded to questioning as follows:

"Chairman Biden: I refer to your March 9, 1987 letter to Senator Nunn and an account given by Senator Levin that he placed in the Congressional Record of his March 12 meeting with you. You indicate in your letter to Senator Nunn that the October 1985 analysis of the negotiating record "did not provide a complete portrayal of the ratification proceedings with respect to this issue." You wrote further that you "did not review this material personally". . . . According to Senator Levin, you repeatedly disavowed the 1985 memorandum regarding the ratification record which was prepared by 'young lawyers' on your staff.

"Now, Judge Sofaer, you have had, in recent months, no hesitation in making categorical statements to the effect that the ratification record of the ABM Treaty supports the broad interpretation. You made those statements in a number of different forums . . . . It would be very helpful if you would give us an analysis of what . . . is still accurate and what part may not be . . . .

This extensive report provides an exegesis of Abraham Sofaer's factual and constitutional claims, and a detailed rebuttal of both. The authors wish to note the valuable contribution to that report by two Committee consultants: James P. Rubin of the Arms Control Association and the Committee's former Legal Counsel, Professor Michael J. Glennon of the University of California—Davis.

In view of Senate passage of the Levin-Nunn amendment, which prohibited any practical application of the "reinterpretation," and in anticipation that the Senate's forthcoming consideration of the INF Treaty would provide a crucible for debate on the underlying constitutional issue, S. Res. 167 was never brought to the Senate floor.

[14] Testimony particularly pertinent to this criticism was provided by William Sims, former Attorney Adviser in the Office of the Legal Adviser, who had resigned over this issue. See Joint Hearings, supra note 7, at 202–225.

[15] S. Rep. No. 164, supra note 13, at 66–67.

[16] In its final form, as passed by the Senate after minor Byrd and Cohen amendments on the Senate floor, see infra note 41, the Biden Condition reads as follows:

"The Senate's advice and consent to ratification of the INF Treaty is subject to the condition, based on the Treaty Clauses of the Constitution, that—

"(A) the United States shall interpret the Treaty in accordance with the common understanding of the Treaty shared by the President and the Senate at the time the Senate gave its advice and consent to ratification;

"(B) such common understanding is based on:

"(i) first, the text of the Treaty and the provisions of this resolution of ratification; and

"(ii) second, the authoritative representations which were provided by the President and his representatives to the Senate and its Committees, in seeking Senate consent to ratification, insofar as such representations were directed to the meaning and legal effect of the text of the Treaty; and

"(C) the United States shall not agree to or adopt an interpretation different from that common understanding except pursuant to Senate advice and consent to a subsequent treaty or protocol, or the enactment of a statute; and

"(D) if, subsequent to ratification of the Treaty, a question arises as to the interpretation of a provision of the Treaty on which no common understanding was reached in accordance with paragraph (B), that provision shall be interpreted in accordance with applicable United States law." 134 CONG. REC. S6937 (daily ed. May 27, 1988).

[17] The "resolution of ratification," the vehicle by which the Senate grants consent to a treaty's ratification, is termed misleadingly; it is the Executive, acting pursuant to the Senate's consent, who actually ratifies a treaty, placing it into force for the United States.

The Senate, through amendments to a treaty's basic resolution of ratification, may condition such consent in two ways. It may require, by means of a "reservation," an alteration in the obligations undertaken through the treaty. Such a condition requires that the Executive obtain formal concurrence from the other party or parties before or at the tim e of ratification. Alternatively, the Senate may require, as a condition of its consent, certain behavior on the part of the Executive. Such a condition does not require the concurrence of any other contracting party, but does acquire the force of law if and when the President acts upon the consent so conditioned. See generally Koplow, supra note 1, 1394–95, 1401–02 (discussing the Senate's various options for expressing particular interpretations of a treaty).

[18] After its receipt by the Senate, the voluminous "record" was stored in a special room in the Capitol, where interested Senators could view this collection of documents. Only an astute and dedicated reader, however, could master such an amorphous body of information—a fact from which one reasonably may infer that, in the Senate as in the Executive Branch, opinions about the content of the "negotiating record" were more numerous than informed opinions.

[19] See Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, The INF Treaty, S. Exec. Rep. No. 15, 100th Cong., 2d Sess. 435, 443 (1988) [hereinafter INFT REPORT]. This report contains a comprehensive analysis of the treaty interpretation issue and the Biden Condition, see id. at 87–108, and is quoted here extensively. The authors wish to note with appreciation the considerable contribution to that report by the Committee's former Legal Counsel, Professor Michael J. Glennon, who served as an informal consultant to the Committee during consideration of the INF Treaty.

[20] Apparently for tactical reasons, the Administration had taken the Legal Adviser off the "front lines" of the treaty interpretation issue.

[22] See INFT Report, supra note 19, at 443.

[23] An attention-getting articulation of this premise by Abraham Sofaer was as follows:

Mr. Sofaer: When [the Senate] gives its advice and consent to a treaty, it is to the treaty that was made, irrespective of the explanations [the Senate] was provided.

Chairman Biden: Would you say that again? Joint Hearings, supra note 7, at 130.

[29] Despite the common impression that the Sofaer Doctrine was a theory in which a treaty's "negotiating record" played a direct role, the Foreign Relations Committee pointed out:

"[There is] no necessary relationship between the Sofaer Doctrine and a treaty's "negotiating record" (aimed at international obligations). By way of example, one may imagine circumstances in which the Sofaer Doctrine (aimed at domestic obligations) would be asserted but the "negotiating record" would play no role. Let us say that President Reagan's successor and Secretary Gorbachev wished to "reinterpret" the INF Treaty in a manner inconsistent with what the Senate had been told in consenting to ratification. The Sofaer Doctrine would play the role of helping the Administration loosen its obligations under domestic law, while as between the parties there would be no resistance to the new meaning being put on existing words and thus no need to justify the change by reference to a "record." Indeed, under this scenario the "record" would be assiduously disregarded, because it reflected a meaning contrary to that which the parties wished to adopt."

[30] See Koplow supra note 1, at 1408–12 (discussing the possible divergence of domestic and international interpretations).

[31] For further discussion of the modern "conservative" tendency to view constitutional concerns as a "liberal" impediment to the Commander-in-Chief's efforts to defend America in a dangerous world, see Biden & Ritch, The War Power at a Constitutional Impasse: A "Joint Decision" Solution (forthcoming 77 GEO. L.J. (1989)).

[32] INF Report, supra note 19, at 103.

[33] The authors wish to express appreciation to Professor Louis Henkin for his generosity in making himself available for frequent consultation with regard to the accurate phrasing of the constitutional principle expressed in the Biden Condition. The question of whether to affirm such a principle as a condition of Senate consent to INF Treaty ratification, however, was a separate, tactical issue on which Professor Henkin's advice was not sought.

[34] As stated in the report:

"The issue addressed by the Biden Condition is not a struggle over who interprets treaties. It is solely and indisputably the President's responsibility to interpret and implement treaties for the United States. At issue is the question of what limits are to govern the President's latitude in exercising that power.

"The issue is not whether and what testimony by the Executive is "authoritative." To answer that question is still to be without an answer as to whether "authoritative" representations are in any way binding on the Executive. The issue is whether and how such representations have a binding significance under United States law. . . .

"The issue is not whether the Executive is to be bound by every last utterance of its representatives before Congress, but whether and how the principle of original "shared understanding" is to govern a treaty's implementation. Shall it be axiomatic that such "shared understanding" is reflected in authoritative Executive representations of the treaty's meaning? Or must the Senate deal with the Executive as an adversary, who will not act in good faith and around whom a cage of explicit stipulations must be built?

"The issue is not a Senate effort to chart new constitutional ground, but an Executive effort to do so. It is not the Senate but the Executive which seeks to assert constitutional principles in a manner which expresses an aggressively broad claim on power. An adequate response requires no counter-assertion of Senate power but a simple manifestation, as reflected in the Biden Condition, of Senate unwillingness to acquiesce in Administration assertions which, if not refuted, could imply acceptance of a radical aggrandizement of Presidential power." INFT Report, supra note 19, at 107–08.

[35] Id. at 97–98.

[36] Id. at 104–05. As the Biden Condition was being formulated, Senator Christopher Dodd usefully suggested the phrase "insofar as such representations are directed to the meaning and legal effort of the text of the Treaty" as a means of narrowing the scope of those executive representations to be regarded as having binding significance.

[37] Id. at 98.

[38] Id. at 105. The Committee continued as follows:

"For example, in response to questions, the Administration provided "authoritative" representations regarding a number of issues of direct concern to the Committee, including: the meaning of "weapon-delivery" vehicle in Article II; the effect of Article XIV on U.S.-NATO weapons cooperation; the effect of Article VII on testing of sea-launched cruise missiles; and the effect of Article II on the testing of strategic missiles at INF ranges.

"Given the context created by the Sofaer Doctrine, however, the Committee could not—without the countervailing effect of the Biden Condition—have been assured that such Administration representations were determinative of the Executive's obligations in carrying out the Treaty. Accordingly, in the absence of the Biden Condition, some Members would have felt obliged to propose specific conditions on these and other issues." Id.

[39] Only days after announcing his intent to offer the Condition at the appropriate time in the Foreign Relations Committee's consideration of the INF Treaty, Senator Biden entered the hospital with a health problem that prevented his return to the debate. He therefore wishes to acknowledge, in addition to the key roles played by Senators Nunn and Levin, the major contribution of several members of the Foreign Relations Committee—particularly Senators Christopher Dodd, Paul Sarbanes, Alan Cranston, John Kerry, and Daniel Patrick Moynihan—in supporting and defending the Biden Condition.

[40] The emphasis on United States obligations under international law voiced during the debate by opponents of the Biden Condition bore two ironies: (1) it was expressed by an Administration and by Senators not known for such concern and (2) the AMB Treaty "reinterpretation," which they sought to defend through their legal arguments, represented a blatant disregard for international law.

[41] Technically, the Biden Condition was an amendment to the resolution of ratification. Under parliamentary procedure, an amendment to an amendment—a so-called second degree amendment"—precludes further amendment. Senator Byrd's modification originally was intended to be such a "second degree" amendment. As matters evolved, this technique proved unnecessary when the "Cohen corollary" discussed below produced the support necessary to ensure that the Condition would not be vulnerable to weakening amendments.

[43] Id. Certainly one explanatory factor was the pressure of time; the President and many aides had already departed for the Moscow summit, where INF Treaty ratification was scheduled to occur. Perhaps equally important, the residual "Administration" in Washington was led at this point by Howard Baker, the White House Chief of Staff—but also a former Senate Majority Leader and a man attuned to the adage that our government consists of laws, not men.

[55] Answering questions before the American Society of Newspaper Editors in Washington, D.C., former President Nixon—who signed, submitted to the Senate, and ratified the ABM Treaty—stated:

"Since the Senate has no advise and consent, a treaty . . . means whatever was presented to the Senate. As far as what was presented to the Senate was concerned, it was what we call the "narrow" interpretation. There is no question about that."

[56] Cf. Koplow, supra note 1, 1377 & n.102 (indicating that the Sofaer Doctrine might have obligated the Senate to examine the "negotiating record").

[57] INFT Report, supra note 19, at 100-01. The Committee continued: "The traditional approach does not, of course, preclude reference to the "record" where such reference can be useful in explaining the effect of treaty provisions which may appear ambiguous or about which questions may arise. The Executive may sometimes wish to initiate such reference to the "record"; on some occasions the Senate may request a detailed account of the interchange which resulted in a particular treaty provision. But this case-by-case approach is far superior to a systematic submission of the "negotiating record," which implies either that treaties tend to be replete with ambiguity or that the Executive cannot be trusted to present an accurate account of the obligations to be assumed by the United States. Neither assumption should be allowed to govern the basic Executive-Senate interaction in the treaty-making process." Id. at 101.

As to the status of the INF Treaty "negotiating record" already transmitted to the Senate, the Committee stated:

"Now that the INF Treaty "negotiating record" has been made available to the Senate, the status of these documents requires resolution. In the Committee's view, the resolution would not have been satisfactorily achieved by any stipulation [as some Senators had suggested] declaring the Senate had scrutinized the "record" and satisfied itself that the "record" was in harmony with the formal Executive branch presentation of the Treaty. Such an approach could entail at least three significant problems:

"(a) institutionally, it could imply that such scrutiny is important to the Senate's examination of treaties and thus should be institutionalized;

"(b) retroactively, it could imply that such scrutiny should have been exercised in the past; and

"(c) specifically, with regard to the INF Treaty, it could leave open the question of what is to be done if, in the future, there is an assertion—for example, by a subsequent Administration—that notwithstanding the Senate's perception of harmony there was an inconsistency between the "record" and the Executive presentation.

"Accordingly, the Committee believes that no formal finding concerning the contents of the INF Treaty "negotiating record" would be wise. In the Committee's judgment, the status of this "record" is established by the basic principles affirmed in the Biden Condition. If U.S. treaty interpretation is to be based upon the shared understanding of the Senate and the Executive at the time of ratification, and if that common understanding is reflected in authoritative statements made in seeking Senate consent to ratification, the sources of interpretation which appear at variance must be subordinated to those authoritative statements.

"In sum, although internal Executive memoranda and the negotiating materials may have been available to members of the Senate, some of whom have sought to assume themselves that this "record" is consistent with the Administration's presentation, the clear corollary of the constitutional principles cited in the Biden Condition is that such documents need not have been examined for consistency and should not be deemed material to U.S. interpretation of the INF Treaty insofar as they are inconsistent with the Executive branch's formal presentation of the INF Treaty." Id. at 101-02.

TERRORISM AND COLONEL HIGGINS

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, the brutal murder of Col. William Higgins must be seen clearly for what it is: Yet another act of terrorism and murder by the Hezbollah.

Our hearts are full of grief for Colonel Higgins' wife and family. And we feel—again—a sense of outrage at the perpetrators of this deed.

There must be no obscuring this act for what it is. The focus of world condemnation must be sharply fixed on the Hezbollah. Our outrage must be focused on the murderers and their allies, Iran and her fanatic agents. No one else should be blamed for it.

The atrocity against Colonel Higgins will renew our determination to act against terrorism. These terrorists, as always, will attempt to justify their crime by blaming America and Israel. One of the goals of terrorism is to blur the distinction between hostage taking and actions against hostage takers.

Some people will fall for this ploy. We have heard some cries of outrage against Israel, rather then the terrorist killers. It is indeed a strange and topsy-turvy world when Hezbollah terrorists can kidnap a U.S. citizen who is part of a U.N. force, torture and hang him—and then have some people blame others for the atrocity.

Israel took direct action against terrorist leaders such as Sheik Obeid of the Hezbollah, one of the world's main sources of terror. Surely we should understand a country which has been the victim of terrorist actions against innocent civilians directly attacking one of the sources of that terror. Surely we should understand what terrorist actions can do to a person, a family, a community.

We must nor permit the Hezbollah or any of its constituent groups blur our focus and confuse our minds. Any such actions play right into the hands of those terrorists and will encourage future terrorists.

Mr. President, the American Jewish Committee and American Jewish Congress have issued statements which forcefully make the point. I ask unanimous consent that those statements be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ON COLONEL HIGGINS

[A Statement by the American Jewish Committee]

NEW YORK, August 1.—The following statement was issued today by Harvey Feldman, International Relations Director of the American Jewish Committee, on the murder of Colonel Higgins and Israel's seizure of Sheikh Obeid:

"As Americans, we bitterly condemn those responsible for the murder of Colonel Higgins. Our hearts go out to his wife, Major Robin Higgins, and his daughter, Christine.

"We recall that this self-styled 'party of God' is precisely the group that claimed 'credit' for the truck bombing that killed our Marines in Beirut in 1983 and again in 1984. They have been involved in assassinations in the Middle East and in Europe, and the destruction of airliners in flight, and the seizure of hostages and the murder of civilians in Lebanon.

"Some have been highly critical of Israel for its seizure of Sheikh Obeid, and have equated it with the 'party of God' abducting Colonel Higgins. But the Marine Colonel was part of a UN peace-keeping mission, while Obeid was the commander of assassination brigades. There can be no equivalence.

"To say that international law forbids seizing killers where you find them is simply incorrect. In fact, U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency personnel have several times seized drug lords on the territory of other countries, and we all recall the bombing of Libya in response to terrorist attacks on U.S. servicemen in Berlin. Israel, like other nations, has the right to take direct action against those who attack its citizens or plan terrorist acts on Israeli territory.

"Hindsight may make us wish for different outcomes, but we must be careful not to confuse the victims of terrorism with those who plan it."

THE COST OF DEFENDING FREEDOM

[A Statement by the American Jewish Congress]

The nation is outraged and frustrated over the latest barbaric act committed by an Iranian-controlled fundamentalist terrorist group in Lebanon. It would be a cruel irony, however, if that outrage were directed, however indirectly, to Israel, the world's most frequent victim of barbarism.

Fortunately, Americans are affected only occasionally by these outrages; the people of Israel live in the very midst of this culture of violence, and must deal with it on a daily basis.

The response of free people to the tyranny and brutality of these primitives who presume to call themselves the Party of God necessarily entails risks. In this case, that risk is first and foremost to the Israelis themselves, who are engaged daily in a struggle with this so-called Party of God, and three of whose soldiers are being held and reportedly tortured by them.

The willingness to incur risks is the price exacted from those who cherish freedom and are prepared to defend it. Americans understand that truth more than most, for in our history, we have paid that price over and over again. The people of Israel must do so with desperate regularity.

Our hearts go out to the families of Col. Higgins and of the other hostages. We believe Americans would be proud if their government had the capacity to strike at and punish the likes of Sheik Obeid who kidnap and torment innocent people. There may indeed be good reasons why we have been unable to respond to these outrages thus far. But it would be a great injustice, and entirely unforgivable, if in our frustration over our current inability to deal with the barbaric behavior of the Hezbollah we were to strike out at our closest ally, beleaguered Israel, for seeking to do that which we wish we would do ourselves.

TRIBUTE TO ARTHUR TONSMEIRE, JR.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today with great sadness to pay tribute to my good friend, Arthur Tonsmeire Jr., who passed away on July 25, 1989. Arthur played such a large role in so many important events in the Mobile community that he certainly represented the ideals for which he was named the 1980 Mobilian of the Year. I suspect that he was deserving of this award during many other years and doubt that Mobile could have selected a more qualified candidate.

Arthur's death left all of his friends and family with a huge sense of loss but also with the understanding that Arthur Tonsmeire, Jr., succeeded where so many others failed. He made a difference.

Arthur Tonsmeire, Jr., was not a man who could be easily categorized. He rose to the top in each area of endeavor to which he chose to devote his time. In his professional and trade associations, in the Army, in his church, in the business community, and in education, his peers recognized Arthur's unique talents which made him an outstanding leader.

Although Arthur's distinguished life included so many outstanding accomplishments that I could not begin to give a comprehensive list, some of his achievements stand out. When he died, Arthur was chairman emeritus of the board of the bank where he began working when he was 26 years old. From his first position at the First Federal Savings and Loan Association, he moved through the ranks until he was elected as president of First Federal which later became Altus Bank.

He was involved in almost every aspect imaginable of the Mobile area civic activities. He was past president and executive committee member of the Mobile Area Council of Boy Scouts of America as well as the Boys' Clubs of Mobile. His many activities in Mobile include serving as a member and past president of the Honorary Fellows of Mobile College as well as a member of the executive committee of the board of the University of South Alabama.

In addition to his many activities in the local community, Arthur became well known around the State for his outstanding leadership as a director and past president of the Alabama Cattlemen's Association.

Arthur Tonsmeire, Jr., provided all who knew him with the inspiration to strive to reach for lofty goals, to endeavor to live their dreams. He was one of the most successful men in Mobile and yet so much of what made him a great man revolved around his desire to help others in his community. He will be remembered as an outstanding Mobilian, an outstanding Alabamian, and most importantly an outstanding man. He will be missed greatly.

Thank you, Mr. President.

PATRIOTIC SONG BY GARY SHOOK

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, during the time since the Supreme Court announced its decision concerning the desecration of the American flag, many people have become concerned about protecting our flag. The flag means so many things to so many people. Each person expresses their feelings in a different way. Some place their hands over their hearts, others salute, still others express their feelings creatively. A few weeks ago a song came to my attention that tells a great deal about how Americans feel about the flag. This song is called, "Don't Burn Old Glory," and was written by a talented Alabamian named Gary Shook. Here are the words to his song.

DON'T BURN OLD GLORY

Old Glory stands at the top of a hill, against the darkened sky. Once young, brave men lay mortally wounded with silent weapons by their side. They shed a veil of tears and now they're glory bound. They believe in God and country and that old flag should never touch the ground.

Just a piece of cloth you say, made by human hands. Tell that to the loved ones of the warriors washed up on foreign sands. I see her blowing in the wind, a wave of red, white, and blue. I think of all the hard times and battles she's been through.

She flies above the Arizona that lies beneath the sea, a place we call Pearl Harbor where the ultimate price was paid. She flew at Iwo Jima, Saipan, and Pork Chop Hill. She flies above our Nation's Capitol. I hope she always will. I guess I'm old fashioned, but I sure swell with pride when I see Old Glory flying against God's clear blue sky. So take your vote and make your choice. Tell us how its going to be. But if you decide to burn that flag, don't burn it in front of me.

Thank you, Mr. President.

REGARDING THE C.S.S. "ALABAMA"

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise today to share with my colleagues an article about the Confederate ship, the C.S.S. Alabama, which appeared in the May/June issue of Alabama magazine. I have come to the Senate floor before to introduce a resolution stating that the United States has never surrendered title to this vessel or her artifacts and I hope soon to come to the floor to announce the signing of an agreement with France and Great Britain regarding the recovery of artifacts from the C.S.S. Alabama.

In the meantime, I believe that this article provides an accurate chronology as to the events surrounding the attempts to recover these artifacts and provides some insight into the importance of these artifacts to the people of Alabama.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BATTLE FOR THE C.S.S. "ALABAMA"

(By Al Browning)

She was the most notorious commercial raider in naval history, wreaking havoc on Union merchant ships from the Texas Coast to the Indian Ocean. The battle that sunk her off the coast of France was one of the most famous of the Civil War and the last two-vessel standoff of the wooden ship era. Her tenacity was a symbol of the Confederate spirit. Now, with the discovery of the C.S.S. Alabama in 180 feet of water near the coast of France, the tenacity of Alabamians who want her remains is being tested.

It was only in mid-April that a tentative agreement was announced that would loosen a gridlock of claims to the vessel by Britain, the United States, and France that had blocked recovery by any country. Salvage of the wreck from the bottom of the inhospitable English Channel will push the limit of underwater archaeological technology, but it promises to yield thousands of valuable artifacts. Yet to be determined, however, is what museums will ultimately gain possession of those artifacts.

Involved Alabamians say a significant portion belong in the state for which the Alabama was named, and in Mobile, the home of her commander, Admiral Raphael Semmes. But a host of museums worldwide are ready to lay claim to the artifacts as well. Now, as when she plied the high seas, the Alabama is in the midst of international rivalries.

The Alabama was built in England in 1862 from an innovative design that incorporated both sail and steam. Confederate President Jefferson Davis commissioned her to Captain Raphael Semmes.

Semmes' orders were to wage war on Union commercial shipping. The mission was accomplished with unprecedented results. But she never docked at a Confederate port because they were blockaded by the Union navy early in the Confederacy. Permanently distanced from her country, the Alabama roamed the seas. "When it comes to American notoriety among ships, she's at the head of the class," said Michael Higgins, project director at the New York Merchant Marine Museum.

"Union ships were running scared of the C.S.S. Alabama. In fact, Union commanders often kept their ships in port when they heard rumors that the Alabama was in the area—even when people knew she was far away. She created terror every place she went."

During her 22 month patrol of the Atlantic and Indian oceans, the crew of the Alabama captured, bonded or burned some 65 ships, including the U.S.S. Hatteras, and destroyed $5 million in Union cargo.

On June 19, 1864, the Alabama was sunk during a dramatic duel with the U.S.S. Kearsarge off the coast of Cherbourg, France in the English Channel while 17,000 spectators viewed the battle from shore.

Salvage of the Alabama was first considered just months after it sank, but the idea was abandoned. The general location of the ship was known, based on the Kearsarge's logs and first-person accounts, but it was long considered unreachable.

The French navy began conducting informal searches for the Alabama in 1978 as part of training exercises for sonar operators aboard minesweepers stationed at the Cherbourg naval base. Then the ship was found in 1984 by the French in 180 feet of water, about four miles off the coast in what is now French territorial waters.

Divers removed dinner plates and confirmed that the structure was wooden. A sighting of the 100 pound Blakely cannon, which sunk the Hatteras, confirmed the ship's identity.

The find was not officially announced until September 1987 when French Navy Captain Max Guerout disclosed the discovery at a maritime history conference in Charleston, S.C.

Requests to dive at the site had been mounting prior to Guerout's announcement. Rumors of the find had intensified British and American interest.

British preservationists had earlier won a battle to save Dry Dock Number 4 at the Cammill-Laird shipyard near Liverpool from destruction because it was the site of the Alabama's construction. Rumors of the ship's discovery led to a popular proposal to return the ship for display at the dock as part of a waterfront revitalization.

In Mobile, Steve Morgan, chief executive officer of Galleon Hunters and Hollywood Adventure Films Inc., appealed in June of 1987 for support of a salvage dive on the Alabama. A diver, Morgan had found the remains of the Kearsarge near Columbia and had applied to the U.S. government for permission to dive on the Alabama.

He proposed raising the ship and bringing her to Mobile. His warning that the British were going after the Alabama gained the attention of David Toifel, a Mobile teacher and a member of the Sons of Confederate Veterans, who then formed the "Save The Alabama Committee."

At the same time, Michael Higgins, of the New York Maritime Museum, and others, and Tennessee lawyer Roger L. DeMik, a Civil War enthusiast, were also working to get the U.S. government to assert its claim to the Alabama.

By the time Captain Guerout presented his plans for a French-led recovery project in September 1987, the State Department—spurred into action by growing interest—had informed the French that the ship was the property of the U.S. government and that no dives should be allowed unless the United States was consulted.

According to DeMik, Captain Guerout outlined extensive plans for undersea study and evaluation of possible salvage—with the French claiming the spoils. "Artifacts from the wreck would be devoted to educational and scientific purposes including development of a museum devoted to the Alabama," DeMik said. "Although not stated in [Guerout's] announcement, French newspaper reports show the French want to place the museum at Cherbourgh, France."

The battle for the ship was on. At the insistence of several congressmen, including Sen. Howell Heflin (D-Ala.), the State Department began, in late 1987, terse correspondences with the French.

"I think in this case we apply international law," said Jean-Claude Brodbeck, a spokesman for the French Embassy. "That being when one recovers a wreck, one is entitled to it. Also, it should be considered that it's resting in our territorial waters. This is an old international law of the sea."

Not so fast, said Peter Bernhardt, State Department deputy director for ocean law and policy and the point man in negotiations. Bernhardt pointed out that the Alabama went down on the high seas. Territorial waters were extended more than a century after the Alabama was sunk. "It's an American warship, not a French warship. We succeeded to the title of the ship as a successor to the Confederate States of America. Ownership of the vessel has not been abandoned, so sovereign immunity is involved in this."

To add muscle to the State Department's position, Sen. Heflin introduced a bill in early 1988 reiterating that the Alabama "is vested in and has never been abandoned by the United States," that no salvage operations should occur unless approved by the United States, that the Alabama and its artifacts would be displayed in Alabama, and that the State Department, the National Park Service and the Save the Alabama Committee should negotiate with France for the ship's "recovery and return."

Sen. Richard Shelby (D-Ala.) and Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.) joined Heflin in sponsoring the Senate bill. First District Rep. Sonny Callahan (R-Ala.) introduced a companion bill in the House.

At the same time, Heflin introduced a similar bill regarding U.S.-Mexican negotiations for the preservation of, and claim to, artifacts on the U.S.S. Somers, which sank off the coast of Vera Cruz, Mexico in 1846 and was discovered there in 1986.

Three months later, the French agreed to discussions and in April, nearly a year later, Bernhardt was given the green light to complete an agreement.

"The final agreement says both nations agree to disagree on ownership issues and will work, together through an international commission to work with whomever the French grant permission to work on the site," said Jim Delgado, director of the U.S. Park Service's National Maritime Initiative. The Park Service is the U.S. agency empowered to oversee U.S. historical wrecks in foreign waters.

After artifacts are preserved, their distribution to museums will be determined by representatives of both nations, he said.

Most participants in the issue acknowledge that only such an international effort can provide the resources and legal authority necessary to complete the project.

While recoveries of other wooden ships have been made, most notably the 15th century Mary Rose of England, the process is lengthy, risky and expensive. Because of the depth and location of the wreck, each diver is limited to work periods at the site of only 15 minutes.

Visibility is limited to about three feet and swift currents during most of the day further limit dive times. Salvage of the wreck could take over a decade and the cost, including conservation and preservation of arifacts, has been estimated at $100 million.

The question of which country would receive the ship itself may be moot. French surveys have indicated that only about 30 percent of the fragile hull is intact. But the ship's smokestack, hatchways and guns are visible as are thousands of artifacts strewn around the wreck. And since the Alabama will be the first Confederate ship to be explored by archaeologists, her cache of artifacts is expected to shed new light on Civil War naval history.

Competition by museums for those artifacts will be strong, even with an international panel in place to make an equitable distribution.

In the United States, some 16 states claim ties to the Alabama as birthplaces of honored Kearsarge crew members, or Alabama officers.

Cherbourg, France lays a strong claim as the site of the battle. So does England, as the birthplace of the Alabama and a litigant in an historical international legal dispute.

In 1872, a five nation tribunal ruled that England as the builder of the Confederacy's commercial raiders, has to pay the United States $15 million in gold as restitution for the Union's cargo, vessels and lives lost in battles with the Alabama. In turn, the United States was required to pay England $1.9 million as restitution for British deaths on the ship.

It was, "perhaps the first such legal action in wartime history," said Higgins of the New York Merchant Marine Museum, which has also expressed strong interest in Alabama artifacts. "That means she had a lead role in the formulation of international law.

"Personally, I recognize the C.S.S. Alabama as the vessel that triggered the demise of what was once a strong U.S. Merchant Marine Corps. During her time terrorizing Union merchant vessels, 715 went under the British flag for protection from her, with 300 more going under the flags of other countries. International law said those vessels couldn't transfer back to the United States, so 1,015 were gone, starting a slow but sure death pattern for the Merchant Marines. Meanwhile, insurance rates for those vessels increased by 900 percent, an astounding figure that was higher than the recent increase in rates for ships in the Persian Gulf."

South Africa, a frequent docking and supply stop for the Alabama, also claims ties. "To this day, South African kids learn a song similar to the way kids in the United States learn Row-Row-Row Your Boat," said Kevin Foster, a Civil War historian with the National Park Service. "They sing Thar Comes the Alabama in all dialects. That's indicative of the strong interest South Africa has in the vessel." At least 20 museums world wide have expressed interest in the Alabama, he said.

But, contends Save The Alabama Committee head David Toifel, Alabama's claim for a substantial portion of the artifacts is as solid, if not more so, than others. "The vessel wasn't named the France, the Birkenhead, the New York, the South Africa or any other than the CSS Alabama. You can extend our claim logically by the name alone. Since Admiral Raphael Semmes chose to live here, die here and be buried here, Mobile is clearly the logical place."

Sen. Heflin, responding to the U.S.-French agreement, renewed his longstanding support for the state's claim. "All of us who are looking at the project from an Alabama perspective want to see the artifacts come to Mobile. The Port City's museum enjoys an abundant amount of community support and I feel the facility is a well suited depository for items that are brought up. Although it is still too early to tell when an exhibit will be on display, I feel the community will see to it that a facility in their city has been readied to house the artifacts."

But Heflin's remarks hint at what may be the trump card in the competition for Alabama artifacts: the ability of a museum to care for them.

Many artifacts begin immediate deterioration when exposed to air. Some will need constant treatment, special solutions and invariable temperature. Others may be preserved so as to need less care.

"There are only a few museums in the world capable of maintaining such fragile artifacts once they are salvaged and preserved," said Foster. "The ones that come to mind are the Smithsonian in Washington, D.C., the combined facilities of the U.S. Navy, the Mariners Museum in Newport News, Va., Mussee' de la Marine in Paris and Consortium Museum in Liverpool.

"It'll take an established museum in Alabama with solid money behind it to get some of the artifacts. These type artifacts need people who understand archaeology and facilities with the best qualifications."

To house the state's share of artifacts, Toifel has proposed establishing a maritime museum in Mobile, an idea that has received support there for a number of years. The Museum of the City of Mobile, which has already raised some funds for a museum covering all aspects of Alabama maritime history, has agreed to cooperate with Toifel's Save The Alabama Committee.

In the mid-1960s, funds to cover the $1 million cost of towing the U.S.S. Alabama to Mobile and establishing the Battleship Memorial Park were obtained from a statewide donation drive, with school childen contributing significantly. Toifel has suggested a similar effort for an Alabama project.

"We're talking about building a maritime museum second to none, a tremendous economic boost to this state."

The Battleship Park hosted 321,000 tourists last year, for a 1988 gross of $1.8 million, an amount that more than paid for its operation.

"We don't want to solicit money until our government reaches a deal with France and England in regard to how the artifacts will be salvaged, preserved and distributed," Toifel said in April. "Then we'll ask for donations. First, we've got to determine a figure at which to shoot."

The ink is not yet dry on the U.S.-French agreement. But an international line has already formed for the Alabama's historical treasures that are expected to be available to museums by the turn-of-the-century. How many and what type of artifacts, if any, eventually come to Alabama is likely to depend on how successful interested Alabamians such as Toifel are in preparing a home for them in the meantime.

THE DAY THE ALABAMA WENT DOWN

Captain Raphael Semmes was fatigued after almost two years of high seas fighting and the C.S.S. Alabama needed extensive overhauling when she entered the Cherbourg Harbor in France on June 14, 1864. Semmes planned to dry dock the ship for repairs and relinquish command.

But before Semmes could obtain permission to dock, the U.S.S. Kearsarge steamed into the harbor.

Despite being warned by his Executive Officer, John McIntosh Kell, that most of the Alabama's fuses had misfired during target practice due to defective gunpowder, Semmes decided to fight. He wrote in his journal: "A quiet spirit of determination is pervading both officers and men. The combat will no doubt be contested and obstinate, but the two ships are so equally matched that I do not feel at liberty to decline it."

The crew spent three days preparing for the battle.

On Sunday, June 19, 1864, some 17,000 spectators—some from as far away as Paris—lined the French coast to watch the battle. Yachts and small crafts circled the waters, including the yacht Deerhound with wealthy Englishman John Lancaster aboard. Also watching the contest from a private boat was artist Edouard Manet. A band on a French warship played Dixie.

Then it unfolded.

The Alabama chased the Kearsarge seven miles out to sea only to see the rival turn to challenge it. The Alabama fired three shots too high. The Kearsarge hit the Alabama with its first two shots in the forward port and broadside.

The ships then began a circular track at full steam, moving in opposite directions. Seven circles left them much closer together. The conflict continued with the Alabama firing two shots to every one fired by the Kearsarge, but missing on the vast majority of attempts.

Then came the pivotal event. A shell struck the Alabama, moving through gun port, and was followed by a second. A third landed on deck without exploding and was thrown overboard.

After 20 minutes of battle, a shell from the Alabama struck the hull of the Kearsarge, a hit that normally would have been devastating. The Alabama crew cheered wildly only to be silenced when it was evident that the Kearsarge was not crippled. Semmes was stunned. Later it was learned that the Kearsarge had put chains covered by wooden planks over her side for protection.

Of the 370 shots fired at the Kearsarge only 28 hit and few did damage because of wet gunpowder.

Eventually the Alabama began taking on water and Semmes risked blowing her up with "full steam" to reach the safety of French waters. "Let her have the steam," Engineer Matt O'Brien said. "We had better blow her to hell than let the Yankees whip us."

Semmes ordered Kell to determine how long the Alabama could stay afloat. He was told 10 minutes. "Then sir, cease fire, shorten sail and haul down the colors," he said. "It will never do in this 19th century for us to go down and the decks covered with our gallant wounded."

Taking the move as a trick, the Kearsarge continued firing. Semmes commanded, "Stand your quarters men. If we must be sunk after our colors are down, we will go to the bottom with every man at his post."

But Kell soon gave other orders to abandon ship. The contest had lasted 70 minutes. Semmes, still in his cap, trousers and vest, grabbed a life preserver, tossed his sword aside and jumped into the water. He was picked up by Lancaster on the Deerhound, which sped to England.

Later, Executive Officer Kell remembered the Alabama's sinking. "As the gallant vessel, the most beautiful I ever beheld, plunged to her grave, I had it on my tongue to call the men who were struggling in the water to give three cheers for her, but the dead that were floating around me and the sadness I felt at parting with that noble ship that had been my home so long deterred me."

Semmes returned to the Confederacy and continued to fight until the war's end. Afterward, he returned to Mobile where he practiced law until his death in 1877.

His sword remains at the bottom of the English Channel.

TRIBUTE TO THE INTERNATIONAL CLASS AFLOAT PROGRAM

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, it is my honor to rise today, in tribute to the International Class Afloat Program aboard the tallship Pogoria. An innovative concept in both education and world peace, the International Class Afloat Program presents a remarkable opportunity for learning and discipline to students from the United States, the Soviet Union, Poland, and several other countries. The theme of the program is "Let's learn to live and work together," and I am pleased to be able to commend such a fine peaceful program and all of its participants.

The Pogoria is a 154-foot Polish tallship crafted in the tradition of the great clippers of former times. The captain of the Pogoria and creator of the International Class Afloat Program is a Polish sailor named Krzysztof Baranowski. He started the program in 1983 with the ideas of the world as a classroom, and a life on the open seas as a unique opportunity which will only come once in the students' lives. Today, the ideas and accomplishments of the program are the same as they were at the program's inception. Although the program is designed to give the students a chance to visit many countries on three continents, it is anything but a pleasure cruise for the students. A day aboard the Pogoria begins at 6 a.m., and includes an hour and a half of exercise, 6 hours of rigorous high school curriculum classes, additional hours of sailing and navigational lessons, as well as numerous chores such as polishing brass, painting, and washing dishes.

Living in such a unique and demanding environment has an incomparable effect on a young man. Not only is it very rare for a 16-year-old boy to live on a sailing ship for several months, but even more incredible is the fact that he will be living with other boys his age from several different countries, including the Soviet Union. Such a situation requires a young man to very quickly learn the art of interacting with others in a cooperative atmosphere. In my judgment, this kind of program is exactly what future leaders of the world need to better undertand each other and help ensure world peace. I can never forget the story I read of one young American on the trip who looked up and saw that the American flag had been torn in a recent wind storm. Before he had the opportunity to go over and repair the flag, he looked over and observed a young man from the Soviet Union mending the flag of the United States. He wrote home to his mother that the sight brought tears to his eyes.

Mr. President, I am proud that several of the American students aboard the Pogoria are from my home State of Alabama. These five outstanding students from Fairhope, AL were joined by six students from Cookeville, TN, as well as ten students each from the Soviet Union and Poland. I believe that the students from this country, as well as those from the other countries, and all persons involved with the Pogoria and the International Class Afloat Program deserve our deepest admiration and most sincere tribute.

Thank you Mr. President.

RESTORE EASTON, PA, TO THE MSA TITLE

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I rise today in support of language in H.R. 2989 as adopted by the Senate Appropriations Committee. This provision provides that the Director of Office of Management and Budget [OMB] shall take appropriate action to provide that the official title of the Metropolitan Statistical Area [MSA] which includes Allentown, Bethlehem, and Easton, PA, Shall be the "Allentown-

Bethlehem-Easton Metropolitan Statistical Area."

Mr. President, the situation is this. The city of Easton is a vital community of hard working and justifiably proud people. But it had been stricken from the official title of the MSA of which it is a part. In taking this action, OMB effectively makes the city of Easton "unofficial."

Easton is one of the three major population centers making up the Lehigh Valley, including Allentown and Bethlehem. All three are contiguous and just minutes from each other by car. The international airport serving this region includes Allentown, Bethlehem and Easton in its designation. Despite this, Easton was not identified as a part of the MSA for census-taking purposes. OMB, in their adjustment of the classification, succeeded in creating a designation which is only two-thirds accurate in describing the area.

Mr. President, I want to point out that this exclusion—while not amounting to too much in terms of OMB's methodology—certainly did make the people of Easton feel as though they had taken a back seat to the two larger surrounding communities in the Lehigh Valley. The recent estimates available indicate that Allentown has a population of 103,758; Bethlehem has a population of 70,419; and Eastor's population is 26,027. Being the smallest in population of the three communities does not justify a diminution of Easton's status.

Congressman DON RITTER and I each introduced legislation in our respective bodies responding to this issue and I am pleased that it is included in this appropriations measure. The legislation which I introduce, S. 292 was designed to correct this situation by requiring OMB to include Easton in the official title of this Pennsylvania MSA. The intent was not to seek possible gains, but restore Easton to its rightful place in the official designation of the Lehigh Valley.

I am pleased we are taking action today to secure pasage of this legislation putting the "E" back into A-B-E—Allentown/Bethlehem/Easton—in the MSA title in 1990.

HARRY EUGENE HARTSOOK

Mr. SASSER: Mr. President, I rise today to call the Senate's attention to the loss of a steadfast and valuable member of the Senate family. This Tuesday, Harry Eugene Hartsook, a long-time member of the staff of the U.S. Senate and the director of my east Tennessee operations, was lost to us. His tragic passing was noted with great sadness by his thousands of friends across the State of Tennessee.

I wish to have printed in the RECORD some remarks I delivered on the occasion of the memorial service in Mr. Hartsook's honor. Also, Mr. President I would like to have printed a statement prepared by Dr. John Callahan, a long-time friend and colleague of Mr. Hartsook, which expresses the heartfelt convictions of all who worked with him over the years.

Mr. President, in addition I wish to have printed for the RECORD editorials memorializing Gene Hartsook which appeared in the Tennessean and the Knoxville News-Sentinel.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENE HARTSOOK

It's hard for me to know how to begin talking about a man who has meant so much to me for so many years.

Maybe the best way is to say that I don't believe we're here today to mourn or to grieve. I believe we're here to celebrate the life of a man who gave to every one of us a gift of great price—a life of warmth and humor and energy and compassion—a life that ennobled whatever it touched.

I believe that very sincerely. I believe it because Gene Hartsook was that rare thing—a truly sensitive, tolerant, caring man . . . a man who loved to talk . . . a man who understood.

If Gene Hartsook was not your friend, it could only be because you hadn't met him yet.

He was never too busy to help. He was never too important to care. Gene thought it was nice to be important—but more important to be nice in kind. He loved politics . . . and politicians and government. He detested injustice, selfishness and intolerance. I think he loved politics so much because he saw it as an avenue to help people. And he was able to bring the art of politics to a high perfection—because, at bottom, politics is nothing more than the love of people—the great and the small, the complicated and the simple, the exultant and the beaten down.

And Gene Hartsook was a man who, above all else, loved people.

During his life, Gene played many roles. He was a mentor to many of the younger members of my staff. He could be a father-confessor or a big brother-figure. And we all delighted in the pleasure of his company.

He could do those things because he knew life. And he knew life so well because he had the priceless, God-given ability to get inside another person's skin, to see the world through another person's eyes, to feel what another person feels.

That ability was the source of his inexhaustible sense of humor, just as it was the source of his penetrating advice and counsel.

Every day was a new day for Gene to bring happiness and optimism to others (but we all know that Gene's day didn't start too early).

It was also that ability which made Gene Hartsook what he was—a man who left virtually everyone who knew him better, wiser, happier and richer by far.

To Bobbie and Pam, Adam, Rodney and David, who ministered to Gene with great courage and devotion, I want to say thank you from all of us here today for sharing Gene with us.

And of Gene Hartsook, I can only say—well done, my good and faithful friend.

GENE HARTSOOK—OUR FRIEND

Today, we, your fellow staff members of Senator JIM SASSER, gather to express our sorrow at the passing of a good and gentle man—Gene Hartsook.

We have known Gene for many, many years. We have fought the good fight together in order to insure that our Government will be in service of the people of Tennessee and the Nation.

But though politics can be rough and tumble and sometimes bring out the worst rather than the best in a person, this was never the case with Gene Hartsook.

Gene was an honorable man. He was a gracious man. He was a man who cared deeply about his wife, his family and his community.

But perhaps what distinguished Gene from others was his love of life and his ability to live each day of his life to the fullest.

Albert Einstein once said, "the tragedy of life is what dies inside of a man while he lives."

If that is the case, there was no real tragedy in Gene Hartsook's all too brief a life. For Gene did not let the trials and turmoil of our daily existence wear him down or make him a bitter or mournful person.

Life was to be lived day by day. Indeed, each sunrise brought, a new day for Gene Hartsook. Each day was a new beginning—an opportunity for Gene to both be happy and optimistic and perhaps even more importantly an opportunity to bring happiness and hope to others around him—whether that be his immediate family, his neighbors, or the many, many people who called on him for advice or assistance.

Gene Hartsook was never too busy to help.

Gene Hartsook was never too important to care.

Like many others gathered here today, we deeply, deeply feel the loss of Gene Hartsook—the man.

But we have been blessed by his kindness—his courtesies—his humor—his thoughtful words—and his gracious actions.

Well, how would Gene wish to be remembered by those who knew and cared for him?

Well, Gene was never a pretentious person. He was never self-important. He knew his strengths, understood his weaknesses and never confused the two.

Perhaps he would have taken comfort and identified with Sir Laurence Olivier who when asked about how he wished to be remembered, said:

"I'd like people to remember me for a diligent . . . expert workman . . . I think a poet is a workman . . . I think Shakespeare was a workman. And God's a workman. I don't think there's anything better than a workman."

And as Gene's colleagues, we would humbly add that Gene was a superb workman—for his wife, Bobbie, his family, his friends, his community, his State and his country.

We will shortly leave here each remembering the special things that Gene Hartsook stood and cared for. But we will remember two special things about Gene—his love of politics and his enduring spirit.

Gene loved politics and the heat of the battle, and for that we owe him our respect and admiration, for as President John F. Kennedy once said:

"The credit belongs to the man who actually is in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood, who knows the great enthusiasms, the great devotions, and spends himself in a worthy cause; who at best, if he wins knows the thrills of high achievement, and, if he fails, at least fails daring greatly, so that his place shall never be with those cold and timid souls who know neither victory nor defeat."

Gene was in the arena. He fought the good fight and was a happy warrior, tasting both victory and defeat in his lifetime. But through it all he was a man of indomitable cheer and goodness of spirit.

He was the type of man who brings to mind the words of the great Southern novelist, William Faukner, who said upon accepting the Nobel Prize in 1949,

"I believe that man will not merely endure. He will prevail. He is immortal, not because he alone among the creatures has an inexhaustible voice, but because he has a soul, a spirit capable of compassion and sacrifice and endurance."

Gene Hartsook has been taken from us. We shall miss his love, his laughter, and his kindness of heart.

So let us offer Gene our prayers, perhaps best expressed in this old gaelic blessing.

May the road rise to meet you,
May the wind always be at your back,
May the sun shine warm on your face,
The rain fall softly on your fields;
And until we meet again,
May God hold you in the palm of his hand.

Good-bye Gene Hartsook—may you rest in peace forevermore.

A MAN'S HONORABLE PROFESSION

Mr. Gene Hartsook was one of those rare individuals who proved that politics can indeed be an honorable profession.

A former assistant Tennessee commissioner of insurance and state fire marshal, Mr. Hartsook had been an aide to Sen. Jim Sasser for about 10 years. He died earlier this week after a lengthy battle with cancer.

Mr. Hartsook, a staunch Democrat, served as field coordinator for Senator Sasser in East Tennessee, an area whose political geography he knew like the back of his hand. Because of his expertise, he was frequently called upon for advice and analysis about politics.

"He was one of the finest public servants I have ever known," said Senator Sasser, remarking on the dedication Mr. Hartsook brought to his positions with state government and as a senatorial aide. He saw politics as a means to accomplish noble ends—the solving of people's problems.

But equally important, as many of those who knew him best pointed out, was Mr. Hartsook's capacity to be a friend and a gentleman. His good work in the public eye was matched by his many private acts of kindness and friendship. For that reason, above all others, his life will long be remembered and appreciated.

[From the Knoxville News-Sentinel, Aug. 2, 1989]

WE WILL MISS GENE HARTSOOK

All of us will miss Gene Hartsook, an aide to Sen. Jim Sasser who had an ability to make the federal government work for those who often seemed removed from it in East Tennessee.

Hartsook, 61, a native of Loudon County and an active figure in area business and politics, died Monday following a lengthy struggle with cancer. He had been East Tennessee Field Coordinator for Sasser for the past 10 years.

"He had a sense of how government could work to best serve the people," Sasser, "He had a marvelous way of working with people. He had a highly developed sense of fairness."

Hartsook became a widely known business figure in East Tenneseee during the 1950s and early 1960s, when he co-owned the H&H Buick Co. in Lenoir City with his brother, Lynn.

He later became an arson investigator for the state's Regional Fire Marshal's Office, then went into business with his brothers as a Realtor with the Hartsook Realty and Auction Co.

From 1975 until he joined Sasser's staff in 1979, he was assistant commissioner of insurance and state fire marshal.

Sasser and Gov. Ned McWherter spoke of Hartsook as one who enjoyed his work and took pleasure in helping others. Those qualities will endear Hartsook's memory to East Tennesseans and will make his place difficult to fill.

EMANUEL AND JUDITH LURIE

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last month, I had the pleasure of meeting with Judith Lurie of Moscow. Judith was recently given permission to visit her family in Israel, but she must return to Moscow as she, her husband, Emanuel, and their daughter, Bella, continue to be denied permission to emigrate, 10 years after their first application.

In January 1980, the Luries received permission to emigrate. They quit their jobs, took their children out of school, and sold their belongings in preparation for their departure. But 5 days before the family was scheduled to leave, their exit visas were revoked on the grounds that Emanuel had access to state secrets while working at the State Scientific Research Institute of Organic Chemistry, a position he has not held for more than 25 years.

Emanuel was not allowed to resume work as a chemical engineer and Judith lost her job as an English teacher, accused of contaminating students.

All of the Luries' relatives are now in Israel and every day they must remain in the Soviet Union is a reminder that, despite the increase in the number of those allowed to leave the Soviet Union, arbitrary denial still continues.

I am pleased about the recent increase in emigration from the Soviet Union. But lasting and meaningful progress will only be achieved when all long-term refusenik cases, such as the Luries, are granted the basic right to emigrate freely.

ALLIED DEFENSE BURDEN-SHARING

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. President, I would like to comment on the allied defense burden-sharing amendments passed by the Senate this week as part of the fiscal year 1990-91 Department of Defense authorization bill. While I had hoped that the Senate would adopt a more far-reaching proposal such as that submitted by Senator MCCAIN, this is a step in the right direction. Fair cost sharing with our allies is something I have long supported. I have offered amendments on this subject in previous sessions of the Senate.

Currently Japan pays for only 40 percent of the cost of its defense and our NATO allies pay for approximately one-third of the cost of their defense. In fact, 60 to 80 percent of our defense budget goes to the defense of our allies. These amendments encourage Japan to contribute more to its defense and seek to keep our percentage of contributions to NATO from growing. They hold the line and keep things from getting worse, but we should start concentrating on making things better. We are simply paying too large a share of our allies' defense expenses.

Japan spends only 1 percent of its gross national product on defense. In contrast, the United States spent over 6 percent of its GNP on defense in 1988. Yet Japan has a gross domestic product that is greater than that of France, Great Britain and Italy combined. It is the world's second largest economy. Japan does provide bases for United States forces, but it easily could contribute far more to the cost of maintaining those forces than it currently does.

No one seriously wants Japan to mobilize as a major military power again. But there are other things Japan can do to take over the burden of its own home islands defense.

The United States has an increasing role to play in maintaining forces in places like the Middle East. Yet these global responsibilities often benefit our allies like Japan more than ourselves. In the Middle East we have deployed forces to help insure a steady supply of oil to the world's economy. That includes Japanese industrial and residential use of petrochemical energy.

Japan could and should increase its contribution to defraying United States costs for stationing forces in Japan from the current 40 to 100 percent of the actual costs. This would increase Japan's defense spending by only a small fraction of its gross domestic product.

Our NATO allies could also significantly increase their contributions. We cannot continue to spend one-half of all our defense dollars on the defense of Western Europe. Our prosperous NATO allies simply must do more to defend themselves.

Our NATO central region allies—Belgium, France, West Germany, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom—should bear most of the brunt of this burden because their economies are the most able to support a higher level of defense spending. They have more developed resources, and industries to protect, than some of the flank nations. The European Economic Community of 1992 should be able to provide increased revenues for our allies to defend their own territory.

There are critical military needs in NATO that this country must contribute to. For instance, command, control, and communications needs much more work to develop true inter-operability between forces. Our best defense is the ability to communicate efficiently with each other in battle. Other mutual defense systems also need U.S. financial support.

Nor can we ignore those in the Soviet Union who may again bring a very conservative hostile government to that country. I hope we see continued glasnost, but the real possibility exists that we could again face a Stalinist military power. We must not downgrade our capability, but seek to distribute it more equally among NATO allies.

We need to maintain the strength of our reserves, and continue our ability to rapidly deploy them overseas. Our forward-based stocks of weapons and supplies need to be sustained, if not increased, to meet the potential threat in Europe. We can pull a lot of our troops back from active stationing on the continent, as long as we improve our ability to mobilize and deploy them in a crisis. Readiness need not be affected by cost sharing. An equitable distribution of the cost of European security is what is needed. The days are long gone, just after World War II, when Europe was so war-torn that it could not support its own defense.

Mr. President, the amendments we have adopted are in the right spirit, but we need to demand more effort from our wealthy allies.

SENIOR ENVIRONMENTAL EMPLOYMENT PROGRAM

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. President, the Environmental Protection Agency launched a pilot project in 1976 to utilize persons 55 years of age or older to assist the agency in responding to national environmental mandates without displacing Federal workers.

This program demonstrated beyond any doubt that older Americans were a valuable resource to assist EPA in providing a wide range of services that would not otherwise be available.

The pilot project became an immediate success story with strong bipartisan congressional support. In 1984 its supporters succeeded in enacting the Environmental Programs Assistance Act to convert the EPA older worker pilot project into a permanent, ongoing national program—the Senior Environmental Employment [SEE] Program.

This act included safeguards to assure that the SEE Program would not displace currently employed individuals at EPA or provide employment for older participants when another person had been laid off from the same or substantially equivalent position within the agency.

Throughout its brief history, the value and worth of SEE enrollees have been amply demonstrated in many ways. SEE participants, for example, have won numerous commendations for their effective and efficient service in inspecting schools for the presence of asbestos. They have helped EPA to monitor the quality of the air we breathe and the water we drink. They have inspected underground tanks for leakage of materials which could harm our environment and they have performed other valuable tasks in the communities which they serve.

Recently, EPA Administrator William K. Reilly sent a report to Congress concerning the Superfund program. This report praised the SEE Program and urged that SEE enrollees be used more extensively in Superfund activities. Additionally, Mr. Reilly called upon EPA regional offices to make greater use of SEE participants.

Mr. President, I suggest that my colleagues consider this report and ask unanimous consent that an excerpt from the report, regarding the SEE Program, be included in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MANAGEMENT REVIEW OF THE SUPERFUND PROGRAM

(By William K. Reilly, Administrator U.S. Environmental Protection Agency)

CHAPTER V. A MORE AGGRESSIVE PROGRAM OF COMMUNITY INVOLVEMENT

Give citizens a much greater role in the Superfund program, especially at PRP lead sites.

Strongly support increased citizen involvement in Superfund decisions, accept occasional delays as a result of greater public involvement.

Plan for citizen involvement at each stage of the Superfund process.

Increase EPA staff to allow more frequent communication with the affected public.

Use "Senior Environmental Employees" (retirees) more extensively in Superfund.

Citizens' access to information should be comparable to that of PRP's.

Release information to the administrative record and to information repositories as quickly as possible, and ensure that citizens are notified of the availability of this information.

In addition to increasing EPA's own staff, there are a few other ways of increasing the resources devoted to communications with the public:

1. Regions are hiring Senior Environmental Employees to work with the TAG program. These people are retirees hired by a senior citizens organization, such as the American Association of Retired Persons, to work for EPA. These employees do not count against staffing ceilings, and EPA's experience in using retirees to represent the Agency has been quite good in the asbestos program. All the regions have contracts in place to hire such staff as they need them. Regions could experiment with using these staff for more extensive communications work besides TAGs.

2. Where sites are located at some distance from EPA's regional office, it is usually difficult for EPA staff to see citizens in person very often. As a variation of option #1, EPA could hire retirees who live in the community near the sites. These employees could work on a part-time basis to inform local officials, citizen groups, and other community leaders about developments at the site.

3. Using state or local officials to represent EPA at sites is another way of coping with the limits to EPA resources and the distance problems. At the Bunker Hill site in Idaho, for example, a local health officer of the state health agency serves as the community representative for both EPA and the state. EPA supports this position with grant money to the state. One problem at some sites, however, is that EPA and the state (or the local government) sometimes disagree strongly about the appropriate course of action at a site. Such disagreements make it both difficult and inappropriate for a state or local official to represent EPA.

4. EPA also uses contractors to support its community relations work. The results are mixed. In some cases, where EPA has used contractors to communicate directly with the community, citizens have resented not being able to speak directly to EPA. EPA often uses contractors to interview citizens as they prepare community relations plans, however, and this practice is likely to continue, given EPA's staffing problems. Contractors can also be used to write fact sheets, provide logistical support for public meetings, and so forth. EPA's experience is that contractor support is most effective where the contractors can ensure the continuity of their staff. In that case, the cost of using a contractor to draft fact sheets (or other short turnaround tasks) declines, and the quality goes up. Continuity is so important to communications, however, that more contractor support for community relations cannot be relied on to solve the "consistent communication" problem described above. We must do the bulk of this important work ourselves.

Citizen Expectations: Citizens' perceptions of what constitutes regular and consistent communication are not the same as EPA staff's. We found that citizens expect more than EPA staff, even though EPA staff members think they should be doing more than they are able to do. Where EPA has a successful relationship with a community at a controversial site, there is a consistent pattern of regular, frequent communication with the community.

RECOMMENDATIONS:

The Administrator should increase the number of site managers and community relations staff to allow more frequent communication with the affected public.

EPA should firmly establish communication as a high priority for Superfund managers, site managers, and community relations staff.

Regions should experiment with using Senior Environmental Employees more extensively in Superfund. Where sites are some distance from EPA offices, Regions can hire retirees who live in the communities near the sites to take questions and provide information.

EPA should consider using state or local officials to represent EPA at sites as another way of coping with the limits to EPA resources and the distance problems.

Finding: Frequent turnover of EPA staff is hurting EPA's communications with citizens near sites.

Discussion: Citizens are frustrated by turnover in EPA staff. Communities complain that they have to train EPA staff about the site. The history of the site matters a great deal to site residents; new government staff do not know the history. Communities feel that they must rebuild their relationship with the new staff, and reeducate them about their concerns. The turnover of any key staff can be disruptive—EPA's site manager or community relations staff, state staff, or contractors. Citizens often view them all together.

CONFERENCE ON THE "DEMOCRATIC REVOLUTION"

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, last May, I had the pleasure of participating in the National Endowment for Democracy's annual conference on "The Democratic Revolution." The conference was an unprecedented gathering of democratic activists and intellectuals from around the world, many of them endowment grantees, who gathered in Washington to assess the hopes for democracy.

The culmination of the conference was the awards ceremony honoring two individuals who have made vital contributions, both individually and as part of larger movements, to the cause of democracy. They were Monica Jimenez de Barros, who founded and directed the Crusade for Citizens Participation in Chile, and Jacek Kuron, a key adviser to the Polish trade union Solidarity and one of Poland's most respected political activists.

I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the enlightened remarks of Jacek Kuron at the conference. Mr. Kuron helped conceive and implement the strategy—adopted by Solidarity—which brought about the roundtable negotiations and the dramatic events now unfolding in Poland. Repeatedly jailed and persecuted for his activites, Mr. Kuron has exemplified the personal courage and political conviction that characterize the Polish democratic movement.

As his remarks demonstrate, Mr. Kuron was a forceful advocate of peaceful, gradual change in Poland, "the road to democracy has to be a process—a process of gradual evolution, of gradual building of democratic institutions. It is a revolution in the sense that we radically changed the system."

Jacek Kuron was recently elected to the Polish parliament and will no doubt continue to be a tireless champion of justice, liberty and democracy in Poland.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to read Mr. Kuron's insightful remarks on the current situation in Poland and its historical background. I ask unanimous consent that the text of his remarks be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REMARKS OF POLISH LEADER, JACEK KURON, BEFORE THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR DEMOCRACY

The very fact that in a totalitarian Communist country the authorities met halfway with an anti-systemic opposition in order not to coopt this opposition but to negotiate with it, with the opposition as an autonomous force, is of primary importance.

It is a very unusual fact, and in a way it's a fact denying totalitarianism. Totalitarianism is an attempt to command centrally all social life. It's based on the monopoly of the power center to organize any activities. The monopoly is so total that if citizens gather freely and discuss freely a matter as simple as roof repairs on a block of flats, this constitutes a challenge to the central authority.

This as a monopoly of organization. But the next most important monopoly is a monopoly on information, meaning that every printed word—not to mention the electronic media—is centrally steered by central authority. Therefore, that leads to a monopoly of decision, meaning that all decisions are made by central authority.

It's almost superficial to say that such an ideal cannot be implemented. But any attempt to implement it destroys social, economic and political life.

Therefore if the organized opposition enters into negotiations with the authorities, negotiations which are uncensorially transmitted by television and relayed to every household, one can say that totalitarianism has been broken since all those monopolies were broken. But that, of course, was not the beginning.

The real breakthrough took place in 1980 when the massive wave of strikes led to the establishment of Solidarity, an independent union, which had to be recognized and was recognized by the central government. At that particular moment, the totalitarian system in Poland was broken.

At that time I wrote an essay entitled, "What Next," in which I compared the political situation in Poland with the movement of trains. A railroad schedule in which every tenth train would be independent and self-governing by an accord between the conductor and the passengers would lead to a situation in which either the principle on which the schedule of the whole railroad is built would be changed, or to a series of catastrophes.

And that was the situation in Poland at that time, since within a totalitarian system a massive movement into which over half the population belonged was created. Since the nomenclature, the apparatus of power, did not want to make the necessary structural changes, catastrophe was inevitable; it came on December 13, 1981, as the imposition of martial law. The tanks rolled into the streets. All laws were suspended. The population was terrorized and was submitted to a military and police dictatorship.

One could say that if totalitarianism was broken in Poland in 1980 by this massive popular movement, the imposition of martial law restored totalitarianism. No, this is not my opinion. It's an example, one could say, that certain social processes are irreversible.

The explosion of Solidarity was a denial of totalitarianism, but martial law was also a denial of totalitarianism. Since a totalitarian system is based on those three monopolies of information, organization and decision, the more perfect the system the better camouflaged it is. It becomes nearly invisible.

For instance, in my country a parliament existed, a multi-party system existed, a number of newspapers appeared, and one could see, or one could have the illusion, that this was a normal parliamentary democracy.

If any information and any movement, any action, is centrally planned, those planners can say whatever they please. So, as in August of 1980, the peaceful popular uprising has broken this illusion. This illusion was broken a second time by the authorities themselves—declaring martial law and telling everybody we will use naked force. We will suppress the society with naked force.

And since in a totalitarian system every person, every member of society, is in some measure involved, it creates a certain social compact. We denounced this compact in August of 1980. But they broke this compact in December of 1981.

Thus, a dictatorship based uniquely on force was created, but such a dictatorship is self-destructive. The authorities had two options. One option was to maintain such a dictatorship—a dictatorship which, even more quickly than ordinary totalitarianism, destroys everything, including the economy—or to withdraw from that form of dictatorship.

And finally, after a number of attempts at different solutions, the authorities decided that a certain agreement with society is possible by making an agreement with the opposition. And thus, conditions were created for round-table negotiations, negotiations aimed at allowing society to self-organize and gradually move toward democracy. In other words, the round-table talks were a certain stage in a constant struggle of the Polish people for democracy, previous stages being the enormous social activity in the legal days of Solidarity and enormous clandestine resistance during the days of martial law.

The most important lesson of all these is perhaps that a certain assumption—that totalitarianism can be broken only from the outside since there are no internal forces capable of breaking the totalitarian system—is false. From within, self-organizing society can break and can overcome totalitarianism.

How can you self-organize under a totalitarian system? To answer this question, I have to say that this movement of self-organizing of the society did not begin in August of 1980. We began many, many years before. Looking back at those years, at something which was perceived as a revolution, I look back in astonishment.

It was so simple then. What we wanted was to read books, to talk to each other, to collect money for people needing help—the simplest human actions. And one can organize society around those simple actions and goals, and this very fact is like a time bomb under totalitarianism.

There is one more lesson from this evolution. Many of our friends, members of the opposition in Poland, asked us "Why did you go to those round-table negotiations? Wouldn't it be better to organize people, to increase the potential for social explosion—social explosion which would wipe out this system?"

We said no. We don't want to destroy the system by force. Several explanations and reasons can be given for our view. The simplest reason is that totalitarianism is a system artificially created, artificially designed so to speak, and such a system destroys all life around itself.

If you destroy a political system you cannot bring over another system from the past, nor can you import another system from abroad. You have to create a new system. But that new system would also be a system artificially constructed and such a system would bring back all the faults of the old system.

The lesson, therefore, is that the road to democracy has to be a process—a process of gradual evolution, of gradual building of democratic institutions. It is a revolution in the sense that we radically changed the system. We go from totalitarianism to democracy. If it should be a road to democracy, if it should be a democratic revolution, it must be achieved in a gradual process.

ON ALLOCATION OF REVENUES FROM DRUG-RELATED CRIMES

Mr. ROBB. Mr. President, as a cosponsor of S. 976, I strongly endorse its passage. This bill simply provides a 2-year extension for implementation of section 6077(c) of the Anti-Drug Abuse Act of 1988, which gives precedence to State law in determining the allocation of revenues from drug-related Federal fines and forfeitures.

Under the prior Federal statute, local law enforcement entities were permitted to keep 90 percent of these revenues. And, Virginia followed this Federal allocation even though State law required payment of forfeiture revenues into the State Literary Fund. Virginia's local law enforcement bodies rely heavily on this important source of funding to combat drug use and related violence in the Commonwealth.

The 1988 revision to the Federal statute would require that Virginia's share of these revenues be allocated to the State Literary Fund, in accordance with State law. Now, the Virginia General Assembly has deleted the statutory requirement that revenues from drug-related forfeitures be directed to the State Literary Fund, but it needs this extension of time in order to repeal a similar State constitutional requirement. Without this extension, Virginia's local policy will be deprived of an important source of income at a time when they need it more than ever.

The distinguished senior Senator from Virginia, Mr. WARNER, and I have received requests for this delay from the Governor of Virginia, the Virginia Crime Commission, and many concerned chiefs of police from throughout the Commonwealth. I am pleased to join my colleagues from Virginia in passing those requests on to you.

I urge my colleagues to support this important initiative.

CENSUS BUREAU STAFFING NEEDS

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I rise today as a cosponsor of legislation designed to help the Census Bureau meet its critical staffing needs in completing the 1990 census. By removing the disincentives to reemployment with the Federal Government, this legislation encourages thousands of Federal and military retirees to come out of retirement and join the census bureau in this critical mission.

The census bureau provides a vital function for our National Government. The census provides the basis for the equal representation of all Americans in our National Government and the census data are utlilized by the Congress, by the executive branch, and by the public generally in the development and evaluation of economic, social, and other public policy programs.

It is my understanding that during the peak operations of the 1980 census, up to 30 percent of the census enumerator positions remained vacant. As the economic recovery continues, it will become increasingly difficult for the Federal Government to attract and retain the necessary number of workers to accomplish the monumental task of a nationwide census.

Federal and military retirees could be a significant help to the census bureau in meeting its staffing needs. But a disincentive exists that drives away any Federal or military retiree who wants to lend a hand. Under current law, Federal and military retirees are subject to pension offsets if reemployed by the Federal Government.

Civilian retirees who are employed by the Federal Government have their Federal salaries reduced by the amount of their annuity. Considering the duration of their employment with the census bureau, it is likely their total pay would be offset by their retirement annuity.

Retired enlisted personnel are affected by an offset only if their combined current pay and retirement exceeds $75,500. Few retired enlisted personnel would suffer a loss if employed by the bureau on a temporary basis. With regard to retired military officers, after receiving an initial $7,698 in annual retired or retainer pay, $1 is withheld from every $2 dollars earned as a Federal employee. The legislation we are considering today would exempt these individuals from the pension offset in the limited circumstance of helping process the 1990 census.

The primary purpose of this bill is to provide a means of increasing the potential pool of workers for temporary positions with the census bureau during the 1990 census. A significant percentage of the census work force will serve as enumerators who will visit housing units from which a census questionnaire has not been returned by mail. This followup work is critical considering the number of households that do not return these forms.

Federal and military retirees are familiar with serving the public and will be able to fill this critical need. These individuals can play a major role in helping the census bureau meet its staffing needs particularly during the peak months of the census. Federal and military retirees have a working knowledge of the Federal Government and this can be a critical factor in whether an individual will have a successful experience with the census bureau.

The bureau must recruit more than 1.6 million temporary employees to conduct the 1990 census. It is a daunting task. In the past, the agency has experienced difficulties recruiting and retaining an adequate work force. Federal and military retirees represent a large pool of potential employees, numbering 2 million strong. I believe they should be encouraged to help. I strongly support this legislation and urge its passage.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. ROCKEFELLER (for himself, Mr. BYRD, Mr. BINGAMAN, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. WILSON, Mr. BAUCUS, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. LAUTENBERG, Ms. MIKULSKI, and Mr. PRYOR):

S. 1529. A bill to amend section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930 to respond to the actions of countries that do not provide adequate and effective patent protection to United States nationals; to the committee on Finance.

INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY PROTECTION ACT

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. Mr. President, today I am introducing the Intellectual Property Protection Act of 1989.

I am concerned that American and other foreign companies, especially those in high tech industries, do not receive adequate patent protection in Japan. My Foreign Commerce and Tourism Subcommittee has held two hearings in the past year on this problem and has identified many of the constraints faced by American industry. One of the most significant problems is the very long time it takes to obtain a patent in Japan—an average of over 5 years there versus only 19 months in the United States. This lengthy delay is an open invitation to copying and abuse. A second major problem is the very narrow interpretation of patent claims in Japan. This permits others to make minor changes in a patented invention. The result is that Japanese companies can, and do, appropriate the technology in the original invention at no cost and without the permission of the inventor.

In 1988, our two governments established the United States/Japan Joint Working Group on Intellectual Property in order to try to address some of these important questions. Although this group met twice in the past 12 months, no visible progress has been made on patent issues. At these meetings, the Japanese negotiators have consistently refused to recognize the damage caused by their patent system, damage that costs American industry billions of dollars and strips them of their ability to compete in the future. This damage affects large companies like Corning, BP America, and Allegheny Ludlum, as well as small high technology companies like Fusion and Fibermedia.

I have strongly supported the work of our negotiators in this process. They are good negotiators, but they cannot solve these serious patent problems in Japan without some muscle behind them. This bill provides the tools our negotiators need.

This bill amends section 337 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as it applies to countries, like Japan, where adequate and effective protection for the intellectual property of American business is denied because of unreasonable delays and unnecessarily narrow interpretations of patent claims. American businesses now use section 337 to get help from imports that infringe American patents. This bill would make it more likely that they would obtain relief in the case of products coming from countries with the most damaging patent practices.

Under this bill, the United States Patent Commissioner would prepare a list of the countries that do not adequately protect American patents. When dealing with section 337 cases involving those countries, the U.S. International Trade Commission, the ITC, would no longer be permitted to consider the effect of its decision on unrelated factors now in the statute. Second, the ITC decision would be implemented automatically and not be sent to the President who can now reject it for policy reasons. Finally, products being imported for the use of the Federal Government would no longer be exempt from the ITC decision.

Let me repeat that these changes would apply only to countries that deny American companies adequate patent protection. I am certain that the result of these changes in section 337 would be that Japan and other cited countries would immediately enter into serious negotiations with us to resolve patent problems.

Mr. President, I am introducing this legislation today because I am committed to stopping the unbalanced, one-way flow of technology between the United States and Japan. This has been going on for far too long. We are being seriously hurt by it now, and we will be even more seriously hurt by it in the future. I hope all of my colleagues will support me in this effort.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. President, the Japanese patent process is not an issue which receives much public attention, but it has had a profound effect on many U.S. firms which are developing new technologies, including some in my State.

Readers of the local business press are familiar with the experience of Fusion Systems, Inc., of Rockville and how Mitsubishi used the Japanese patent system to file 200 patents on the technology involved in the microwave lamp developed by Fusion. In this way the giant company was able to delay approval of the application long enough to appropriate the production processes developed by Fusion.

There are many forms of intellectual property rights violations—fake Gucci bags, bogus pharmaceutical products, bootleg audio cassettes. The unfair appropriation of new technology is no less a violation of those rights. Like many Japanese trade barriers, it is subtle, but it is clearly an attempt to pirate U.S. technology.

This is also a market access issue since small, U.S. firms obviously cannot compete in the Japanese market against a domestic giant like Mitsubishi which has developed a product based on their technology.

Unfortunately, we can see an alarming pattern by Japanese firms who use their patent system to siphon off United States ideas.

International patent disputes can be very complicated, but some of the basic issues here seem to me to be very simple. For example, the Japanese were awarded 18 percent of all United States patents in 1986, but United States firms received only 7 percent of Japanese patents. It takes an average of more than 6 years to obtain a patent in Japan compared to 19 months in the United States. Clearly, something is not right. Second, the chain of events on recent cases should indicate to anyone with common sense that the current system provides a Japanese firm with an opportunity to capture United States-developed technology for its own commercial purposes.

The office of the U.S. Trade Representative has been a strong advocate for the U.S. position on the patent issue, but, unfortunately, discussions between the United States and Japan on this issue have stalled. That is why this legislation is necessary.

Small, high technology firms are the heart and soul of our technological future. We absolutely must act now to protect them from predatory actions by foreign firms.

By Mr. LEVIN (for himself, Mr. DODD, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. COHEN, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mrs. KASSEBAUM, Mr. DURENBERGER, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. DASCHLE, Mr. HARKIN, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. CONRAD, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. REID, Mr. BOREN, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. PRYOR, Mr. FOWLER, Mr. WIRTH, and Mr. MITCHELL):

S. 1530. A bill to provide for the establishment of a program that shall facilitate, on a voluntary request basis, the reunion of birth parents and adopted individuals, birth siblings, or birth grandparents or adopted individuals, through a centralized computer network; to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

NATIONAL VOLUNTARY REUNION REGISTRY

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, last year the Senate passed a critical piece of legislation aimed at humanizing the process through which biological relatives separated by adoption, who are looking for each other, can make contact. Currently, for hundreds of thousands of persons seeking one another the process is often costly, cumbersome and futile. The legislation authorizes the Department of Health and Human Services to create a National Voluntary Reunion Registry to facilitate voluntary, mutually requested reunions between adult adopted persons, their birth parents, and birth siblings separated by adoption. The centralized system will make it possible for birth relatives to be accessible to one another, should they do desire. I wish to emphasize that the reunions must be mutually sought and voluntary to be covered by this legislation.

Unfortunately, the House failed to act on the measure prior to adjournment. I am therefore today reintroducing this legislation with the bipartisan support of 24 of my colleagues in the Senate. I am most grateful for the continuing cosponsorship of long-time supporters of this legislation, Senators DODD, MOYNIHAN, COHEN, CRANSTON, and DURENBERGER. And, I would like to thank Senators JEFFORDS, CONRAD, KASSEBAUM, BOREN, MATSUNAGA, DASCHLE, DECONCINI, CHAFEE, HARKIN, ADAMS, HEINZ, REID, SANFORD, RIEGLE, PRYOR, FOWLER, WIRTH, D'AMATO, and HOLLINGS.

Aside from the natural, human desire to know one's family roots and genetic heritage, there are other important reasons to make contact with birth relatives. Many of these individuals need to have access to information which may affect their own mental and physical health and influence their own family decisions. The Senate endorsed this legislation last year because it deals with the needs and emotions of all parties in a careful way. The bill contains specific provisions governing confidentiality and privacy interests, and specifically states that no match would be made unless both parties voluntarily applied to the registry to initiate the matching process.

Mr. President, great effort has gone into this proposal over the years. The efforts of President Reagan's son, Michael Reagan, were crucial to the bill's passage in the Senate last year. In fact, at no time was I more convinced of the need for a national registry than when Michael shared his own personal story with me during a visit to my home last year. I would like to share with my colleagues the letter I received from Michael just prior to our meeting in April 1988. It reads as follows:

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: As you may know, I am an adoptee who has recently had the great privilege of meeting my birth brother and learning about the life-time of loving and caring by my deceased birth mother. You should also know that my adoptive father, Ronald Reagan, supported my desire for a reunion with my birth mother and helped me in my early efforts. When my father helped me, it was the greatest gift he ever gave me.

I believe wholeheartedly in your bill establishing a national registry for adoptees, birth parents and separated siblings. And I support your efforts to make this a reality. I would have used such a registry myself, and it has become apparent to me that my birth mother would have also.

I look forward to meeting you and actively assisting in your efforts to gain enactment of this compassionate legislation.

With all good wishes.

Sincerely,

MICHAEL E. REAGAN.

Had this legislation been signed into law earlier, Michael Reagan might have met his birth mother before her death. A March 31, 1988, Washington Post article about Michael's recently published autobiography—"On the Outside Looking In"—revealed the efforts of Michael's birth mother to keep tabs on him. According to the Washington Post article:

It was through a meeting with Barry Lange, the birth brother he was previously unaware of that Michael Reagan realized the efforts his birth mother took to keep tabs on him. Barry "had brought along a photo album bulging with clips from magazines and newspapers. They were pictures of Michael—often with his father, Ronald Reagan—lovingly collected through the years by his birth mother. She had been tracing his steps throughout his life. Barry revealed that "my mother wanted to have contact with Michael, but she didn't want to initiate it. You don't go knocking on the door and say, "I'm the mother who gave you up for adoption. Aren't you going to invite me in to tea?" Michael Reagan's birth mother died in 1985, never having met her first child.

Mr. President, this proposal enjoys the support of many adoptive parents, and adoptive parent support groups. As I reflect on the numerous meetings I have held, and letters of support I have received on this issue, there are a number that stand out vividly in my mind. I would like to include a few of them for the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed at this point. They are as follows:

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORGANIZATION OF ADOPTIVE FAMILIES,
Long Valley, NJ, April 18, 1988.

Hon. CARL LEVIN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: It is with utmost sincerity and urgency that I send you this letter in support of your bill to establish an unrestrictive National Voluntary Reunion Registry through the Department of Health and Human Services.

The organization of adoptive parents is a non-profit all volunteer organization of adoptive families who seek humane adoption reform. The organization networks with other reform groups on a national level and feel strongly that our sons and daughters deserve the dignity of their heritage. We acknowledge the birth-families of our children through the shared desire to support all efforts towards reconciliation between them and their original family, should they choose to meet.

Many years ago we pledged before the courts to love our children to the best of our ability. Over the years we sadly discovered we could not love away their special needs through adoption. They needed truth and reality beyond what we were capable of giving them.

We need to impress upon those making legal decisions for us the importance and value of our personal knowledge, having been directly involved in adoption. Birthparents and adoptive parents share a mutual love and concern for their children. We hear our sons and daughters speaking out. We support them in the efforts to be accepted as citizens sharing in the same rights so many take for granted. As parents, we resent being placed in the position of keeping our adult sons and daughters locked into needing our permission in making important personal decisions regarding the reality of their heritage. We reject any registry that demands our approval for reunion or access to information. We also reject any registry that would in any way restrict the reconciliation of the adopted person should only one birth parent enter into the registry. We have facilitated one parent reunions and have not experienced any problems with the second parent.

A well publicized unrestricted National Voluntary Reunion Registry through HHS can provide the opportunity for a healthier approach to the adoption experience.

We appreciate your continued efforts, and intend to actively participate in the efforts to gain enactment of your proposal.

Sincerely,

CAROL F. GUSTAVSON,
Founder.

APRIL 20, 1988.

Hon. CARL LEVIN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: I am in complete support of the Adoption Registry Bill you have introduced. It has the overwhelming support of adoption professionals, adoptees, and birth parents, as well as adoptive parents, who now realize that your bill is in the best interest of their adopted children.

I have been the director of a nationally recognized adoption agency in Los Angeles, California for 32 years. After years of experience with all the parties involved in adoption, I have no question but that a National Register is necessary.

Professionals now recognize that reunions represent closure in adoption, that they bring together the missing pieces from the past for all the parties involved in the adoption, and most importantly that they end the distortions and fantasies that have plagued adoptions.

Finally, they prevent the pain and suffering that thousands of adoptees and birth parents are forced to endure in a search that is often fruitless.

The mental health profession strongly supports the need for the Levin bill. The time is here for Congress to grant adoptees, birth parents, and adoptive parents the same rights enjoyed by those of us who are not adopted.

The time is now to humanize adoption.

Sincerely,

REUBEN PANNOR.

Senator CARL LEVIN,
U.S. Senate, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: I was extremely interested to read the Washington Post article regarding your bill to establish a voluntary national clearinghouse for adopted children and their natural parents. I would like to tell you my story and express my feelings as to why I think this is so very much needed.

In 1967, I was sent on an assignment to Vietnam and let me just say I could not be contacted. Unbeknownst to me, my close friend at the time was pregnant with my child. I really think she did not tell me because of the nature of my assignment. When I "came out", I learned I had a daughter. By the time I arrived back, the mother had done the best thing she thought possible and had her adopted. I do not blame the mother for she did what she thought was best for the child at the time, given the circumstances. While I tried to fight it, it was too late and the situation was compounded because I was single at the time.

I have agonized for years. While I would never want to interrupt my child's life, the question keeps coming back to me: "What if she ever wanted to find out who her daddy was?"

The best I have been able to accomplish is that I was able to talk with a very sympathetic social worker in the California Department of Social Services who was able to tell me my daughter was adopted by a fine family and that her case record is empty since the adoption—a sign there have been no problems. The social worker was also kind enough to allow me to place a letter from me to the now young lady in the file so that should she ever want to contact me, she will know she will be welcomed with open arms. Because I am licensed with the California Board of Medical Quality Assurance, this agency will always know my address.

This approach was rather unique but, out of desperation, it has been all I have been able to do. You don't know how troubled I have been at times. How much easier it would have been to have a national mechanism that was widely publicized such as your bill proposes.

I heartly endorse your bill and if there is anything I can do to support you, please do not hesitate to have Ms. Parker contact me.

Respectfully,

D.A. HODGSON, Ph.D.

GAITHERSBURG, MD,
December, 1982.

MY BELOVED DAUGHTER: I just wanted to let you know a few things about me should you ever wonder who I am and what you mean to me.

First of all, let me assure you that you were conceived and born of love. When you were born, I was in Vietnam and could not be reached because I was on a classified mission. Your mother made a decision which, under the circumstances, was probably best for you in the long run. I understand you are with a very loving family, and for this, I thank God.

When I returned, you were one month old and had been adopted. I tried desperately to stop the proceedings but lost the battle because I was single and lived in another state. Even your Grandmother in New Zealand wanted to raise you if she had the chance.

You are my first born—I have loved you all these years although I have not had the opportunity to lay my eyes upon you. I can't tell you how many times I have cried because I cannot know you.

Since you were born, I married and you have two beautiful brothers; John David and Michael. At the time of this writing, they are seven and eleven and unfortunately, they live in Seattle because their mother and I are divorced. She knows about you. As a matter of fact, while we were in Hawaii in 1970, we coincidentally met your mother. I introduced them to one another and we talked niceties. As we left, my wife said to me: "That is your daughter's mother—to which I proudly responded "yes."

Little one—let me get to the crux of the matter. I have tried for years to make some kind of contact with you. Recently, I received some assistance from the Department of Social Services. Current laws do not permit them to disclose your whereabouts—that is fair. They have been very helpful. This letter is being placed on file should you ever try to locate me.

Please remember—I have no wish to disrupt your life. I have every reason to believe your adoptive parents have given you a loving life. However, should you ever choose to seek me out—which means you get this letter—I can only assure you that you are my daughter and regardless of my personal situation at that time, my home is yours and you will be welcomed with open and loving arms.

If I move, you can always get my address from the Board of Medical Quality Assurance in Sacramento—my psychologist license is PN 003788.

Princess, it is somewhat strange. We hear all about how adopted children want to identify their mothers. I hope some day you may want to find your father. This is the reason for this letter.

Your loving father,

D.A. HODGSON, Ph.D.

Senator CARL LEVIN,
Russell Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR SENATOR LEVIN: My search for birth family began in 1962 when my oldest son was diagnosed with Rheumatoid arthritis and suffered a kidney condition (nephritis) from which he bled from the kidneys for three months. At the time I was pregnant with my third child and became alert to the importance of having genetic information. Doctor after doctor asked what our past family history was—"I don't know," I answered, "I'm adopted."

My search was unorganized. There were no support groups to help. I thought I was the only one who suffered these feelings of helplessness and lack of power over my own life—it seemed no one would help me or could help me.

In 1972 I was diagnosed as having cystic kidneys. My doctor suggested I write Canton Catholic Charities and try to get medical background. Catholic Charities said I needed a lawyer—I got a lawyer. They could not release anything to the lawyer, then they said my doctor would need to write—my doctor wrote. They were not too quick to produce any files to the doctor so I wrote again and pleaded that they send him the files out of Christian Charity. They finally sent what they had, which was not much.

Even if agencies do give out old files it is a given fact that birth families develop illnesses over the decades through the years. We need more than one generation of genetic information and we require updating. My third son has a ventricle heart polapse condition, and my fourth son (also my first-born son) have chronic upper respiratory bronchial conditions.

In January of 1985, after 23 years of searching, I found my brother, now named Pat Simon, a broadcaster for the past 25 years, living in Lynchburg, VA. Three months later I found our maternal family. I managed to contact my grandfather's second wife who was still living, and also found some cousins living in the Washington area . . . one cousin is Mary Starrs Brown who does P.R. work for Wolf Trap. Other than these few all my maternal relatives are dead.

We missed our mother by a year and half. George Washington University released our mother's ashes late in 1985. I met my brother in Washington for our mother's funeral. I was literally her pallbearer. I carried her ashes to her grave. My brother, who became a minister in 1984, gave the funeral service and afterward we both took a shovel and literally buried our mother, committing her body to the earth. The death certificates I have managed to acquire of the maternal side show that a definite upper respiratory weakness runs through that branch of the Broderick family. Even though two of my sons suffer upper respiratory problems we are fortunate that the boys never smoked—this would have worsened their condition. What are the chances of having four boys and not having one pick up on smoking? This is genetic information that should have been passed on to us.

Our little granddaughter who is now three years old was diagnosed with rheumatoid arthritis before she took her first step. The story continues into the third generation.

Sincerely,

KATE PIJANOWSKI.

MAY 23, 1988.

Senator CARL LEVIN,
Russell Building, Washington, DC.

I support a National Volunteer Reunion Registry in which birth kin may be aided in reuniting. I am particularly concerned about the separation that comes through adoption.

During my active career as director of two adoption agencies in the District of Columbia (The Barker Foundation and The Peirce-Warwick adoption Service) I was responsible for over 900 adoptions. In the 1950s and 1960s, it was a time when the shame of having a baby out of wedlock was great, when raising a bastard child was inconceivable. I witnessed the anguish and sacrifice of these mothers in releasing their infants for adoption. These same mothers now seek their grown children. They do not ask for the privacy we think they want. Over 90% of them welcome the reunion of their adult offspring lost through adoption. Adopted adults, separated siblings, birth-fathers and grandparents are also seeking each other.

Through my research in adoption I have recorded in two books, the "Art of Adoption" (1976 WW Norton) and "Adoption in Transition" about to be published the plight of adopted persons growing up without knowledge of genetic origins. I am convinced that as human beings and United States citizens, they are being denied their civil rights. A reunion registry makes it possible for these adopted adults to gain the knowledge they need, the genetic facts they must pass on to their children.

It is evident that state reunion registries cannot function effectively in our distinctly mobile society. Only a national registry can reach all searching persons. A National Volunteer Reunion Registry makes sense and can act to humanize and reconstruct our broken family trees.

Respectfully submitted.

LINDA CANNON BURGESS.

I am a birthmother who surrendered to adoption in 1960, I was pleased and encouraged when Michigan instituted a mutual consent registry in 1980, but was disappointed that no effort was made to notify adoptive parties of its existence. After six years of searching, and the expenditure of over $3,000, I finally located my daughter shortly before her 24th birthday. Because she no longer lived in Michigan, she was unaware of the mutual consent registry, so had not filed. However, she had made a preliminary contact with a Detroit search and support group in 1981, taking the first steps toward finding me. She did not feel comfortable about conducting an all-out search for me at that time, because she feared my rejection of her. Had she attended a support group meeting, she might have learned about the Michigan registry, where I had filed a consent waiver years ago. My daughter was one of two adopted children raised in an unfortunate home situation.

The mother's alcoholism led to her death at the age of 52, leaving the two girls motherless at ages 12 and 14. My daughter left home without finishing high school at age 17, and was totally on her own thereafter. One year later, I had begun to search for her, yet we were kept apart by the current adoption system. Because of that system, I also lost my first grandchild to abortion. I have learned that, at age 20, my daughter became pregnant out of wedlock. Being her own sole means of support, and having no family to back her up, she saw abortion as the only realistic alternative open to her. It breaks my heart to realize that at the time she was going through this excruciating decisionmaking process, I was searching frantically for her. If only I could have found her in time, I could have offered her the loving support she needed to bring her child to term and parent it. You will be interested to know that at the present time I am helping a number of adoptive parents in search of their children's birthparents.

Sincerely,

MICHIGAN BIRTHMOTHER.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, let me also share the remarks of a young woman who wrote to me and whom my staff interviewed relative to the proposed National Voluntary Reunion Registry. She is a 49-year-old professor, formerly of a university in Connecticut, and she has been searching for her birth mother for 12 years:

Had I surrendered a child for adoption, I know I would always secretly wonder what had happened to her, if she were alive, if she were well, if she had found a good home. I would wonder what she looked like, what sort of person she had become. I would wonder if she wondered about me. Sociological research done over the last ten years indicates that my projections were not unfounded. The overwhelming majority of women who give up children for adoption are disturbed by these questions all their lives. Many are even haunted by guilt. This is a chapter in their lives that never has an ending. They can never put their thoughts to rest. If only I could speak to the woman who gave me life I could tell her how happy I am; I could tell her about the wonderful people who adopted me and the joy she brought into their lives. And for my part, I could see her, discover the secret of my origin, know the country from which my ancestors came, the story that is my history. I could reenter the bond of life that links all other people. I would see a blood relative—until my daughter was born. I could never discern my features in the face of another, and again and again since my son's birth people have asked me "who does he look like?" I want to know the answer. For twelve years I have been searching. Under our present laws, the search is difficult, frustrating and time consuming. It is often expensive, as well. I worked for two years with a young man searching for his biological parents and when he finally found them, learned that his birth mother and he had both gone to the same adoption agency for information within months of each other and were denied help. Each was assured that the other would not want to know and would suffer from knowledge or contact! We cannot but question why this myth is being perpetuated in the face of direction refutation, personally in this case or more broadly in the face of sociological studies of hundreds of involved parties.

I would also like to bring to the attention of our colleagues excerpts from a letter I received from Thomas J. Bouchard, Jr., professor of psychology, director, Minnesota Study of Twins Reared Apart:

Because of my work with twins reared apart conducted at the University of Minnesota, I have been contacted by parties interested in the passage of the national reunion registry proposed by Senator Levin.

I have, over the last 7 years, worked with a large number of twins who were separated early in life and who have experienced adult reunions. The vast majority of these reunions have been monumentally positive experiences for the individuals involved, and in no case has a pair of twins reported that they wish the reunion had not happened. This is not to say that there has never been any emotional turmoil; there has been in some cases. I should mention that my own experience with these twins has resulted in a dramatic change in attitude on my part regarding the ethics of facilitating such reunions. Prior to carrying out research, I would have, at best, been more neutral to the idea.

There is no doubt in my mind about the great value of this registry. As Senator Levin points out, a national registry operated by the Department of Health and Human Services would be far more effective and would be a sensible and humane solution to a difficult problem.

I strongly support the passage of this bill. It strikes me as just the kind of activity in which the federal government should participate. It involves an activity that neither individuals nor individual states can carry out in any effective manner. Participation in this activity is voluntary, and reasonable fees for the service should cover most of the expenses. In addition, such a registry would meet a real human need.

Mr. President, I would like to share the sentiments expressed by Lorraine Dusky, a young woman who relinquished her daughter at birth. The young woman's remarks are from an article which appeared in Newsweek magazine. Ms. Dusky is the author of "Birthmark" and is a member of the Adoptees' Liberty Movement Association. I quote:

Somewhere out there is a 13-year-old daughter of mine. Actually, she's another woman's daughter. I gave her up for adoption at birth. I must assume—and I underscore the word "must" for it is the only way I can live with some sort of equanimity—that she has a mother and a father who love her and give her all the things that daughters need. Now, many people imagine that what happens to the woman who gave away a child is that she has a rather gloomy existence, ashamed and alone in her hometown, where there's often a whisper after she leaves the room. Or she is well-adjusted and living in suburbia with 1.4 children and a husband who pitches in around the house. Or she left town and went to some big city like New York or L.A. or Chicago and drowned her sorrows in a career. In any event, she has gone on to make a new life and most probably doesn't think too often of her child, and most likely doesn't want to be reminded of that painful time in her life by a stranger come knocking on her door. Well, it doesn't work out that way. Yes, we do make new lives for ourselves, we work for the telephone company and we win beauty pageants. We write for magazines like this and we produce television shows. We teach school and we run for public office. We get married or we don't. We are ne'er-do-wells and we are the pillars of the community. There are approximately 5 million of us, and we are your neighbors. But we do not forget. And whatever we do with our lives, yesterdays children live in our hearts. I worry that the birth-control pills mistakenly prescribed for me during the first four monhs of pregnancy are somehow harmful to my child today. The American Cancer Society agrees.

Why did I do it? It's a familiar story. At 23 I was unmarried and terrified. I didn't see how I could give my child a good life. Adoption seemed like the best solution for both of us. I can hear some of you thinking—it's been said to my face and behind my back—I made my bed and now I must lie in it. Play with fire and you get burned. OK. You have a point there; I won't argue. But what do you say to my daughter if, when she's grown up—say 18 or so—she wants to find out who her natural parents are, what her story is, if she has brothers and sisters and grandparents other than the ones she grew up knowing?

Why can't my grown-up daughter decide for herself? Having spoken to a great many natural mothers over the last eight years, I believe that the desire to find out what happens to our children is universal, or nearly so. The available data bear this out. The bond of birth is in our genes. The decision I made was a painful one but I made it. If my daughter wanted to know why, I owe her an explanation.

It seems that the psychological connection to one's roots is critical. That there is something missing from my life is beside the point. I was told I loved my daughter enough to give her up to two parents with an income better than my own; in fact, in 1966—when the world seemed quite a different place—I was practically congratulated for my generosity. I cannot change the past, I did what I did. But I imagine my grown-up daughter having questions without answers one day.

The least I can do is give her the right to decide whether she wants to know me.

Mr. LEVIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of this legislation be printed in full following my remarks. It is my hope that the Senate will speed the passage of this much-needed legislation.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. President, as citizens of a country which prides itself as a melting pot of cultures, many of us are fascinated with our heritage. Iowa, not unlike most other States, is inhabited by an array of persons from different backgrounds. I believe many of us gain a sense of pride and a sense of who we are by knowing who our ancestors were. Yet, there are some who do not know the identity of our parents. While I was fortunate to know my parents and my siblings, I am concerned about the many Americans who did not have this opportunity. I am pleased to support Senator LEVIN's bill today which establishes a Voluntary Reunion Registry.

For understandable reasons, our current law protects from inspection the birth records of adoptive children. However, for those cases in which both parties want to find the other, this legislation establishes a system through which biological parents, adult adoptees, and separated siblings can locate one another. In order to facilitate a reunion, however, both parties must voluntarily seek this information. Thus, the rights of those individuals who wish to maintain their anonymity are protected.

Mr. President, I am pleased to join with Senator LEVIN in introducing this legislation. I hope this Congress will act swiftly to enact it, thus helping individuals in search for their families.

Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I am pleased to join my distinguished colleague from Michigan, Senator LEVIN, as an original cosponsor of legislation to facilitate the reunions of those adult adoptees, birth parents, and separated siblings who are seeking to find one another. Our bill would accomplish this by establishing a National Adoption Reunion Registry.

The need for this legislation is great. There are presently millions of long-separated adoptees and birth parents who wish to be united. Studies have shown that four out of five birth parents desire a reunion with their adopted children. Experience with State registries indicates that a similar percentage of adult adoptees wish to make contact with their biological parents. In addition, there are scores of adult siblings who, separated from their brothers or sisters in early childhood, now seek to be reunited.

Unfortunately, identifying and locating a separated birth parent, child, or sibling can be a costly, time-consuming, and frustrating endeavor. Our legislation would greatly streamline this process by enabling interested parties to voluntarily find one another through a centralized reunion registry. At the same time, our proposal would respect the privacy of those who wish to remain anonymous. I believe that this approach represents a careful and sensible way to address the needs and interests of all parties involved.

I was pleased when the Senate unanimously approved a version of this legislation in the 100th Congress. Unfortunately, the measure, which was scheduled for consideration in the House on the day of adjournment, was never taken up.

I am very hopeful that both the House and Senate will consider, and pass, this measure in the 101st Congress. I encourage my colleagues to lend their support to this most worthy and humane effort.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am proud to rise as a supporter of this proposal which will facilitate the ability of adult adoptees and their birth parents to locate each other through the creation of a national adoption registry.

The concept of contact between adult adoptees and their birth parents is an emotional one. There are those who argue that such contact constitutes a violation of the privacy rights of both birth parents and adoptees as well as being a threat to the parental rights of the adopting family. There are also those who argue that the right of adult adoptees to get some level of information about their birth parents is absolute. This proposal goes to neither extreme. It is a sensitive response to the needs and desires of all parties. It balances the right that all of us have to privacy with the understandable desire that all human beings have to know more about who they are and where they come from.

The distinguishing characteristic is simple: It establishes a national registry in which, upon request, the names of birth parents and adult adoptees are placed. The existence of such a registry allows for the possibility of matching adult adoptees and birth parents and allowing them to contact each other if they desire to do so. While the proposal establishes a national registry, names of adult adoptees and birth parents are placed in the registry only if the parties request that they become a part of the system. As a result, matches made through the registry require the mutual and voluntary consent of both the adult adoptees and the birth parents.

This proposal does not—does not—create a situation in which unwilling contact is possible. All it does is facilitate the possibility of contact if, and only if, both adult adoptee and birth parent make an active effort to allow that contact to take place. Each party must voluntarily place their names in the registry and, as a result, a match can only be made if both parties desire it.

Mr. President, we are doing nothing more than responding to reality. There are similar voluntary registries in some States and the experience we have had with them proves that the system does protect the rights of all parties. Unfortunately, such State-based systems are restricted, by nature, to the geographic boundaries of the State; since we are a mobile society, that limitation reduces the utility of a State-based system. In addition, Mr. President, the plain truth is that without a national registry, both adult adoptees and birth parents are engaged in private searches for each other—searches which do not recognize the privacy rights of the other party. It is my hope that the failure of one party to indicate a willingness for contact by placing their name on the registry will discourage such freelance searches and, as a result, help protect all parties from contact which they may not desire.

Let me conclude these remarks, Mr. President, by paying special tribute to Senator LEVIN and his staff. I know that they have been working on this issue for close to 10 years now. I am absolutely convinced that opposition is based on a failure to understand the extraordinary protections which have been built into it. And I am also absolutely convinced that adult adoptees and birth parents and everyone who cares about this issue, will applaud this the Senator from Michigan and his staff for their persistence, the creative and responsible way in which they have addressed this issue.

S. 1531. A bill to facilitate the effective management of fisheries resources in U.S. waters by including tuna in the regulatory structure under the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

TUNA MANAGEMENT ACT

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to correct a serious problem in our marine fisheries. The conservation and management of our ocean heritage is very important to me, and without rapid action, we are in danger of depleting yet another vital fishing resource. My bill, the Tuna Management Act of 1989, will close a serious gap in the present enforcement of effective fishing management in our coastal waters.

The purpose of this bill is to discontinue the exception made in the Magnuson Fishery Conservation and Management Act that prevents the direct management of tuna fisheries in United States waters. When this act was first passed, it was argued that, given the highly migratory nature of tuna, the only way to effectively manage this resource was through international agreement. At that time, it was accepted that the United States distant water tuna effort was the only economically significant tuna fishery, and that any action to include the tunas within the jurisdiction of the United States would lead to reciprocal and retaliatory action by other coastal states. Since that time all other coastal states except Japan and Korea have adopted 200 mile economic zone laws which include the tunas as a part of their domestic resources. Today, the United States stands alone as the only Atlantic coastal state adhering to an open access policy for the tuna fishery.

In that same period, the market for American tuna, especially Atlantic tuna, as a fresh fish product, has expanded enormously. The Mid-Atlantic Fishery Management Council has estimated that the tuna taken from the Atlantic waters of the United States by the Japanese alone had a wholesale value of over $22 million. This is money that could flow to American fishermen if tuna were managed as other species are.

This bill will be of special interest to sports fishermen. Both charter fishing and individual sport fishing have become an important part of the coastal economy; spending on activities directly related to recreational tuna fishing amount to over $250 million a year in this country. This figure reflects only the value of the fish caught and the gear used; it does not include the invigorating recreational experience that comes from the fishing trips.

The commercial value of tuna and the extensive fishery for it that exists in our waters are due to the truly wonderful nature of this great fish. I would like to take a few moments to acquaint my colleagues with some facts about the tuna's lifecycle. Tuna are very prolific, spawning thousands of young in a single season. As they mature, they must swim constantly to force water over their gills, swimming that their sleek cigar-shaped streamlined bodies are well adapted for. Unique among true fishes, tunas maintain an internal body temperature as much as 20 degrees above that of the surrounding water. These characteristics combine to make the tuna a fish superbly adapted to life at sea.

The life of the bluefin is typical of most tunas. They spawn in the Gulf of Mexico, spend the winter and spring in warm, subtropical waters, and migrate in the summer up the Atlantic coast. They become capable of spawning after about 10 years, when they have reached a size of over 6 feet in length and better than 300 pounds in weight. Mature bluefin, 30-years-old or more, can weigh in at upwards of 1,500 pounds. They live together in large schools, which vary in size but can number 1,000, swimming about for very long distances. An adult bluefin can swim as fast as 45 miles an hour, making it as good to look at in the water as it is good to eat.

Sadly, for all its marvelous properties, the tuna has not been immune to the pressures of our modern world. The exclusion of tuna from management by American fishery management councils has led to the serious depletion of the stocks of such species as swordfish, billfish, and sharks. Tuna fishing as now practiced by large operations, such as longliners, inevitably results in the catching of related species like swordfish and sharks. Effective management of swordfish populations, an important resource for both sport and commercial fisherman, is impossible without the ability to regulate tuna. Action is urgently needed to prevent the total depletion of our large pelagic fisheries.

This bill will end the now outdated exclusion that prevents the effective management of tuna and other species. This measure is supported by the New England, Mid-Atlantic, South Atlantic, Gulf of Mexico, and Western Pacific Fishery Management Councils, the American Fishing Tackle Manufacturers Association, the Sport Fishing Institute, United Sport Fishermen, the Coastal Conservation Association, and the Atlantic Coast Conservation Association of Virginia. By allowing a more rational and systematic management of our fishery resources, we will benefit both our domestic fishing industry and the future generations who will be able to enjoy a continued bountiful harvest from our waters.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1532. A bill to amended the Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972 to permit volunteers to be considered employees under section 3721 of title 31, United States Code; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

VOLUNTEERS IN THE NATIONAL FORESTS ACT AMENDMENTS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, Americans have a history of volunteering in times of need. During last summer's fires in Yellowstone, so many volunteered to help that some had to be turned away. Volunteers have helped make America great. Volunteers will help keep America great.

One of the great things about America is our national forests. They are a national treasure; but a treasure in danger of growing tarnished. The tarnish grows when work is not accomplished. Declining budgets during the Reagan years caused Forest Service employment levels to drop 26 percent between 1980 and 1988. Managers with less money and fewer people had to retrench and decide what work to postpone or eliminate. Trail maintenance was deferred. A thousand campgrounds were closed. Other programs were slashed.

Volunteers came to the rescue of our national forests as the full impact of the budget shrinkage hit. The number of volunteers rose 320 percent between 1980 and 1988 to 65,000 individuals. The value of their work quadrupled to $25.5 million last year. This year, two people will volunteer for every full-time Forest Service employee.

Volunteers perform a wide variety of tasks that contribute significantly to managing our national forests. On the Green Mountain National Forest in my home State of Vermont, volunteers have made major contributions to the archeology program.

Vic Rolando has spent years identifying kilns, furnaces, and mines associated with the early Vermont iron industry;

Alan Rixon has spent summers SCUBA diving at Silver Lake, recovering large numbers of 19th-century artifacts and two prehistoric dugout canoes;

Christy McDonnell has spent a year doing laboratory analysis of a pollen core from Little Rock Pond that will give us better insight into the paleoenvironment of the national forest; and

Eleanor Rogers, a retired librarian, has spent a summer researching historical documents to describe the location and types of historic sites in the Goshen area from 1782 to 1886.

Without these Vermont volunteers, none of this work would have been done. Volunteers play similar important roles on each national forest.

The Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972 provided only barebones support for the program. It authorizes three basic benefits to volunteers:

First, the agency can cover incidental expenses, such as transportation, lodging, and meals while working as a volunteer, and uniforms. For many volunteers, this means a free ride in a pickup truck to a worksite, a box lunch while working, a bunk in a Forest Service cabin for Saturday night, a hard hat and work gloves.

Incidental expenses don't cover all the costs borne by volunteers. To make their work easier, volunteers often bring along their own equipment. Some of the tasks volunteers perform require a substantial personal investment in specialized gear, such as the SCUBA equipment Alan Rixon uses to explore Silver Lake.

Second, the act transfers to the Federal Government their liability for tort claims while serving as a volunteer.

Third, if a volunteer is injured while performing volunteer service, the act authorizes the Federal Government to provide compensation as if the volunteer were a Federal employee.

My cosponsors and I believe it is now time to add a fourth benefit to these three. We need to authorize the Forest Service to reimburse a volunteer for personal equipment damaged, lost, or stolen while serving as a volunteer.

Mr. and Mrs. Earl Durrant served more than 1,000 hours during the summer as campground hosts at the Chittenden Brook Campground on the Green Mountain National Forest. They bought a small screen tent to protect themselves from those pesky Vermont mosquitoes and black flies. The day after Labor Day, a severe thunderstorm traveled through the area. Downbursts knocked over several hundred acres of timber. Portions of the campground were damaged; the Durrants' tent was destroyed. Mr. Durrant walked 2 miles, partly through blown-down timber, to telephone for help. The Durrants were understandably upset that after devoting the summer to the Forest Service, they could not be compensated for their screen tent. The bill we are introducing today would authorize compensation for losses like this.

Similar situations can be recounted from other national forests. A volunteer photographer taking wildlife photos along a river for the Forest Service lost $1,000 worth of personal camera gear when the raft she was riding in overturned. A volunteer inventorying and maintaining trails had $500 worth of personal camping gear stolen from his tent one evening. Another campground host lost lawn chairs worth $50 in a flash flood.

This bill will not provoke an avalanche of compensation requests nor will it exacerbate our national debt problems. All payments, estimated to total $5,000 annually, would come from appropriated funds. There would be no increase in budget requests as a result of this legislation. The Secretary of Agriculture and Office of Management and Budget both endorse the bill.

We can all be proud of the contributions made by volunteers on our national forests. They are generous with their time, abilities, and personal equipment. We will profit from volunteers' work. If volunteers' personal equipment is lost or damaged through no fault of their own, it is only fair for the Nation to compensate volunteers for their losses.●

By Mr. MURKOWSKI:

S. 1533. A bill to increase economic benefits from the activities of cruise ships visiting Alaska; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

INCREASE IN ECONOMIC BENEFITS FROM CRUISE SHIPS VISITING ALASKA

● Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, late in the 100th Congress, I introduced a bill to allow Alaska-bound foreign cruise ships to operate from U.S. ports. Today I rise to introduce a new bill for this purpose.

This legislation is badly needed and long overdue. It will correct a situation in which current U.S. law has the unfortunate effect of preventing American ports from benefiting from the growing Alaska cruise industry, because they cannot offer themselves as homeport for the only cruise ships in that industry.

This situation is the unintended result of a combination of factors:

First, the current law prevents foreign vessels from carrying passengers on one way voyages from U.S. ports; second, the majority of the cruise business is one way; and third, there are no U.S. cruise ships operating in the Alaska trade. As a result, U.S. ports must watch helplessly as millions of dollars' worth of business is sent over the border to Canada.

When I offered last year's bill, I made clear that my motive was to generate discussion, so that this year's bill could accommodate the concerns of those who testified before the Commerce Committee's Merchant Marine Subcommittee. I am fully confident that the bill I am introducing today does just that, and will do so with zero negative impact to any segment of the U.S. merchant marine industry.

The bill I am introducing today provides an exemption to the Passenger Service Act for foreign cruise ships, so that they may accept one-way passengers on voyages between Alaska ports and between Alaska and other U.S. ports. However, the exemption is strictly limited.

First, it applies only to vessels larger than 1,000 deadweight tons, so that no foreign vessel will be able to compete against U.S. vessels active in the small-ship tour business.

Second, it applies only to passenger vessels, not those which carry both passengers and vehicles or other cargo. This provides the necessary protection for the U.S.-flag vessels of the Alaska Marine Highway System, which carry both.

Third, the bill contains language guaranteeing that if a U.S. vessel is prepared to enter the market, the number of foreign vessels already in service will be reduced by the amount necessary to equal or exceed the passenger capacity of the U.S. vessel. This feature is intended to maintain the current incentives for the development of U.S. service.

Finally, the bill applies only to vessels which provide the type of luxury accommodations and services unique to the recreational cruise industry. This will prevent even the remote possibility that a foreign company might use the exemption to establish a passenger-only commuter service that would compete with the Alaska Marine Highway System.

There are those who will argue that U.S. maritime policy is weakened by any change. However, it should be clear from the stipulations on this bill that I have no interest in weakening U.S. maritime policy. My sole interest is to ensure that U.S. ports can compete for business on equal footing with their Canadian counterparts.

In fact, the United States has much to gain from this particular change.

Mr. President, roughly 200,000 people take an Alaska cruise each year. Most of these people are U.S. citizens on a one and only dream vacation to Alaska, and they want to make the most of it. For that reason, the most popular tour offering is a cruise-and-fly combination, in which travelers cruise the famous Inside Passage, spend a portion of their time sightseeing in Alaska's interior region, and fly back to their departure point. However, because there are no U.S. ships in the Alaska cruise trade, every single one of those one-way passengers must embark from a foreign port, usually Vancouver, British Columbia.

Although most of the arriving passengers fly in to Washington State's Seattle-Tacoma International Airport, the majority are bused to Vancouver to await their ships. Although they are Americans bound for one of America's most beautiful regions, their pre-sailing hotel, restaurant, entertainment and giftshop dollars are all scooped up by Canadian vendors.

And when their ship sails, although it may carry a few supplies purchased in the United States, the bulk of its food, fuel, general supply, and repair and maintenance has also been purchased on the spot, in Canada.

The cash flow in this industry is substantial. According to some estimates, Vancouver may receive benefits of as much as $216 million per year. Even the most conservative estimates place the direct return to the city's economy at a minimum of $31 million per year, and probably more.

I cannot claim that those revenues would immediately come to the United States if the law were changed. In fact, even with the change, it would probably take considerable effort to convince most vessel operators that they should pull up stakes and move to the United States. But that's not the point. The point is that U.S. cities ought to be able to compete, and right now they are barred from doing so.

In weighing protections and benefits, we must ask ourselves, "Whom are we protecting?" and "Whom does our current policy benefit?"

Passage of this amendment will set the stage for creating hundreds of new jobs by removing a needless barrier between U.S. companies and their potential customers. Furthermore, I firmly believe it can be done without risking even one existing U.S. job.

In short, Mr. President, this is an idea whose time has clearly come, and I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting it.●

By Mr. D'AMATO:

S. 1535. A bill to provide for the minting of coins to commemorate the World University Games; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

WORLD UNIVERSITY GAMES COMMEMORATIVE COIN ACT

● Mr. D'AMATO. Mr. President, I rise today to introduce legislation to authorize the minting of a gold coin to commemorate a tremendous event that will occur in 1993 in Buffalo, NY. Buffalo has recently been selected as the site of the 1993 summer World University Games. This highly competitive selection process resulted in Buffalo's selection over both Shanghai in the People's Republic of China and Fukuoka in Japan.

This is a great event for America, for New York, and for Buffalo and the western region of New York in particular. The World University Games, which began in 1923 under the auspices of the International University Sports Federation, are recognized throughout the world as an outstanding intenational amateur sports event, second only to the Olympic games in importance. Some of America's most outstanding Olympic and professional athletes have competed in the World University Games during their collegiate careers. Athletes like Greg Louganis, Larry Bird, Sean Elliot, and Danny Ferry have all competed in the World University Games.

The Buffalo World University Games will bring 7,000 amateur athletes from 120 countries from around the world to compete in track and field, swimming, diving, basketball, soccer, volleyball, tennis, fencing, and water polo.

Mr. President, western New York is blessed with tremendous natural beauty and a great vitality. This will be especially true in the summer of 1993. Western New York will welcome 200,000 visitors and spectators to the World University Games. The selection of the American city as the site on the 70th anniversary of the first games is an auspicious event for America. The games are another opportunity to demonstrate the importance of amateur athletics to America and the preeminence of the United States in truly amateur athletics.

The bill I am introducing today is the first opportunity for the Congress and the Federal Government to demonstrate its support for the 1993 summer games. Greater Buffalo has performed exceptionally in bringing these games to America. Having cleared the first hurdle of nomination as the U.S. contestant for the games and having cleared the second hurdle of the international selection committee, Buffalo is now approaching a series of hurdles involved in preparing for the games. Passage of this bill will properly mark the approach of this tremendous event and give the people of Buffalo a proper symbol of the support which I am sure the Congress feels toward the 1993 World University Games. I urge my colleagues join me in providing this "roar of the crowd" as they race through the preparation for the games and cosponsor this important legislation.

I am also introducing today, for the same purpose, a bill to authorize the minting of a World University Games commemorative medal. Should recent difficulties with coin legislation commemorating sports events unfairly prejudice the chances of passage of the World University Games Coin, I will seek the support of my colleagues for this bill.●

By Mr. DURENBERGER (for himself, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. GARN):

S. 1537. A bill to provide relief to State and local governments from Federal regulation; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATORY RELIEF ACT

● Mr. DURENBERGER. Mr. President, I rise today to bring to your attention the problem of unfunded mandates. Over the past 30 years, Federal regulation of State and local governments expanded dramatically and has become an increasing burden to the financial well-being of State and local communities. The bill I am introducing today will help stem the tide of burdensome and unwarranted mandates by the Federal Government. It will also help State and local governments to comply with the costs of future legitimate mandates designed to achieve important national goals.

In an age of declining Federal aid to State and local governments, Federal mandates continue to increase. The mandates cover such areas as civil rights, environmental protection, water quality, education, fair labor standards, State-administered Federal trucking standards, and expanded public welfare costs. It is likely that in the near future we will see additional mandates in the area of child care, clean air, and civil rights for persons with disabilities.

While efforts have been made to make legislators more aware of mandate costs—including requirements that CBO issue State and local cost estimates of proposed Federal legislation—GAO has reported that these efforts have done little to alter the course of legislation. Certain constraints such as legislative deadlines, limited availability of information, and competing priorities affect the usefulness of these reports in restraining unwarranted mandates.

Currently there are no reliable estimates of the total costs of mandates to State and local governments; it is estimated, however, to be in the area of tens of billions of dollars a year. This tremendous burden on State and local governments drains resources that might be more effectively used at the local level.

That is why today I am introducing along with Senator WILSON the Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1989. The premise of this bill is simple: If Congress passes legislation to pursue a national purpose, the Federal Government should take responsibility to pay the costs of achieving it. It will require Federal reimbursement for all additional direct costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with any significant new Federal rule or regulation. If no such relief is forthcoming, the bill provides that no Federal agency or court shall enforce the unreimbursed regulation. However, where it is inappropriate for Congress to share the costs of regulatory implementation because of fundamental rights or generally accepted goals are involved, this bill permits Congress to exempt a national regulation from reimbursement upon a two-thirds vote of both Houses.

Nationwide, 14 States have established requirements for reimbursing local governments for the cost of State mandates. Another 18 are considering legislation to do so. In a majority of those States where reimbursements are made, those requirements deterred passage of mandates, prompted modification of the proposed mandates, or—to a more limited extent—induced funding of mandates.

The clear message these days from Washington to State and local governments has been "we are counting on you." But when it comes down to finance these new responsibilities, the message from Washington is "don't count on us." Mr. President, this legislation will translate the empty promises of Washington into real achievements. I urge my colleagues to join with me in support of this important legislation.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the Intergovernmental Relief Act of 1989 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 1537

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Intergovernmental Regulatory Relief Act of 1989".

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) Federal regulation of State and local governments has become increasingly extensive and intrusive in recent years;

(2) such regulation has, in many instances, adversely affected State and local governments by placing excessive fiscal burdens on such governments;

(3) such excessive fiscal burdens have weakened the foundation of the Federal system of government;

(4) the elimination of revenue sharing will exacerbate such fiscal burdens, and thereby will further weaken Federal, State, and local systems of government; and

(5) there is a lack of adequate fiscal resources to carry out necessary Federal regulation of State and local governments in order to enable such governments to comply with intergovernmental regulations which take effect on or after the date of enactment of this Act.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to establish procedures to—

(1) assure that the Federal Government pays the total amount of additional direct costs incurred by State and local governments in complying with any intergovernmental regulation which takes effect on or after the date of enactment of this Act; and

(2) ascertain the burden on State and local governments resulting from compliance with intergovernmental regulations in order to promote efforts to assure that such burdens are reduced to the minimum level consistent with achieving major national objectives.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act, the term—

(1) "additional direct costs" means the amount of costs incurred by a State or local government solely in complying with an intergovernmental regulation promulgated pursuant to a Federal law concerning a particular activity which is in excess of the amount that such State or local government would be required to expend in carrying out such activity in the absence of such law, except that such term does not include any amount which a State or local government is required by law to contribute as a non-Federal share under a Federal assistance program;

(2) "compliance reforms" means market oriented procedures to replace or supplement strict governmental monitoring and enforcement activities, including the establishment and enforcement of penalties for noncompliance with Federal regulations that reflect the degree of such noncompliance, and the establishment of procedures to permit compliance with State or local regulations in lieu of compliance with Federal regulations;

(3) "Director" means the Director of the Office of Management and Budget;

(4) "economic incentives" means the process of making price corrections in the marketplace through governmental fees or subsidies that encourage or discourage activities in accordance with public policies;

(5) "Federal agency" has the meaning given to the term "executive agency" in section 6501(3) of title 31, United States Code;

(6) "Federal assistance" means any assistance provided by a Federal agency to State and local governments or other recipients, in the form of grants, loans, loan guarantees, property, cooperative agreements, or technical assistance, except that such term does not include direct cash assistance to individuals, contracts for the procurement of goods or services for the United States, or insurance;

(7) "intergovernmental regulation" means a regulation promulgated by a Federal agency that requires a State or local government to take certain actions or requires a State or local government to comply with certain specified conditions in order to receive or continue to receive Federal assistance and which requires the termination or reduction of such assistance if such government fails to comply with such conditions;

(8) "local government" has the same meaning as in section 6501(6) of title 31, United States Code;

(9) "marketable rights" means the process for allocating scarce resources through the establishment of rights that can be traded or sold among bidders, rather than through the distribution of resources through the issuance of permits by a Federal agency;

(10) "performance standards" means the criteria or goals that must be attained to comply with a Federal regulation, and does not include a detailed specification of the means of compliance;

(11) "significant law" means any Federal law which is likely, in the judgment of the Director of the Congressional Budget Office, to result in total additional direct costs to all State and local governments of $25,000,000 or more in any fiscal year, or is likely to have exceptional fiscal consequences for a geographic region or a particular level of government;

(12) "small government" means a government of a city, county, town, village, school district, or other special district established under State law which has a population of less than fifty thousand;

(13) "special provisions for small governments" means requirements for small governments contained in an intergovernmental regulation which are different from the requirements included in such regulation for other governments, and includes simplified compliance methods designed to reduce administrative burdens on small governments and reduced standards and modified compliance mechanisms which are proportional to the capabilities of small governments to comply with such regulation; and

(14) "State" means each of the several States, the District of Columbia, Guam, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, and the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands.

TITLE I—REVIEW OF INTERGOVERNMENTAL REGULATIONS

REPORT REQUIRED

SEC. 101. (a) Not later than thirty days after the date on which the President transmits a budget for a fiscal year to the Congress pursuant to section 1105 of title 31, United States Code, the President shall submit to the Congress a report specifying and evaluating the economic costs, noneconomic costs, and additional direct costs which have been incurred or which will be incurred by State governments and local governments in complying with intergovernmental regulations during the most recently completed fiscal year, the fiscal year in progress, and the first two fiscal years immediately succeeding the fiscal year in progress.

(b) Each report required under subsection (a) shall include—

(1) a list of each intergovernmental regulation in effect during each fiscal year for which the report is made and a citation of statutory and administrative authority for each such intergovernmental regulation;

(2) an estimate, for each such intergovernmental regulation, of—

(A) the total amount of economic costs, noneconomic costs, and additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred in each such fiscal year by the government of each State and all local governments in such State in complying with such regulation in each such fiscal year; and

(B) the ratio (stated as a percentage) which the total amount of additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred by all local governments in a State in complying with such regulation in each such fiscal year bears to the total amount of additional direct costs that have been incurred or will be incurred by the government of such State and all local governments in such State in complying with such regulation in such fiscal year;

(3) an estimate, for each such regulation, of the economic and noneconomic benefits that will be provided in each such fiscal year to each State government and all local governments in such State as a result of compliance with such regulation during each such fiscal year;
